Mr. FLETCHER. I have some question about it. To be frank with the Senator, I do not know that it would, but I am assuming that it might, and I presume the Senator from New Hampshire feels that it does. I have some question about its having anything to do with the Government Printing Office.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to say that I propose to vote against the amendment because I do not think the bill covers the Printing Office at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. I am not quite sure of that. I have not viewed it from that standpoint, and I have not discussed it from that standpoint, but I think there is a great deal in what the Senator suggests, and even from that point of view the amendment is not needed and would be unwise. I think under the circumstances the amendment ought to be defeated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit a further question? The Senator fortified his argument a moment ago by the suggestion that a great deal of printing is done outside of the Government Printing Office. Is not that negligible? Is it not a very small amount?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator it has been our policy to decrease that as much as possible, and I think we have pretty largely eliminated it. There were a number of branch offices, the Senator will recall. We have, I think, pretty nearly eliminated them, but my impression is now that, on account of the unusual demand for printing of all kinds, there has been some increase in that direction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Congress can at any moment abolish those branch offices, of course, if it chooses to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is likely; but this one thing the President would change if the bill gives him any control at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is absent in connection with the liberty loan. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. My colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator from Connecticut were present, he would vote the same way as the Senator from Montana intends to vote.

Mr. MYERS. I am informed that if present the Senator from Connecticut would vote the same way as I shall vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. From what source does the Senator from Montana get that information?

Mr. MYERS. From the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]; but if there is any doubt about the matter I shall not vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Connecticut is against the amendments and for the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. This amendment was never previously presented, and the Senator from Connecticut, therefore, has had no opportunity to examine it.

Mr. MYERS. Then, being paired with the Senator from Connecticut, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I have a pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 44, as follows:

So Mr. GALLINGER's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to further amendment.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if there were anything necessary to emphasize the epoch-making character of the pending legislation it would be the vote which has just now been recorded. One hesitates to talk to a jury the minds of whose members are already fixed, but it is my judgment that if the Senate of the United States is going to accept an Executive mandate and pass this bill, with every suggestion of amendment refused, Congress can only fittingly complete the program by delegating the taxing and appropriation power, adjourn, and go home.

When this measure was first proposed to the Senate, Mr. President, I thought, in my own mind, that I should like to give it support. I am a believer in concentration of powers for war; I am even a more emphatic believer in coordination of powers; but you can not coordinate until you first participate, and the difficulty with the war machinery of the Government is the lack of participation on the part of a number of cogs in the completed machine. I think experience on the western battle front of Europe has demonstrated the need of concentrated authority, and I believe in it very cordially; and I have no partisan or political prejudices which would lead me to deny any essential power to the President of the United States.

I think, Mr. President, we can speak on this question now without subjecting ourselves to the charge of partisan inspiration or intent. My judgment is that the votes recorded on Saturday will disprove for all time the partisan character of any objection to this bill. I note in the roll call that 10 very representative and highly trusted members of the majority side, all of whom are in as cordial sympathy with the party in power as those who outnumber them, voted for the amendments proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]; while, on the other hand, on this side of the Chamber there were seven votes made up of so-called "stand-patters" and so-called Progressives, who gave their sanction to the administrative wish. So I think it is fair to say that no one can urge that there is partisan intent back of any objection to the bill.

I make bold to say, Mr. President, that if I were inspired by partisan designs I would urge the speedy passage of this measure; then I would hold the administration everlastingly responsible for everything done; and then add to it the greater and more serious responsibility of the alteration of the American form of government. I do not know that I take myself too seriously as a Senator. I have always had the notion, however, that this was a pretty important office, and out in my State they look upon an election to the Senate as an assumption of some considerable responsibility and a command to assume a part of the responsibility of the Government of the Republic. We ought to be consistent. We boast our popular form of government; we proclaim our participation in a war for democracy—though I would have it said in passing that I have never swollen the chorus on that particular issue—we accepted the challenge of the German war party that a republic is not so constituted that it can defend itself; and then, the moment that we are involved, we propose to entirely put aside our popular form of government and dwell in America under the most autocratic form of government on the face of the earth.

If I believed that that was necessary, Mr. President, to win the war, I rather think I should give it my sanction; but until I am convinced of the necessity, in the exercise of my duties as a Member of this body, I beg to be excused.

I am perfectly anxious to coordinate, to cooperate, to concentrate, aye, to consecrate all American power and resources and energies to the winning of this war; but, Mr. President, I am not willing as a Senator to surrender the functions and responsibilities of this body, to create a smoke screen for a retreat from our boasted popular government to the establishment of a complete dictatorship; I think I would rather fight a bit, covering the retreat.

I have offered, Senators, a very simple amendment to the bill, which will again put to the test the judgment of the Senate whether in giving to the Chief Executive every necessary war power we shall also give to him the complete control of our civil affairs, without let or hindrance on the part of Congress. I am willing to go to the very limit in the grant of war authority. I want to say in passing, however, that I am not yet convinced of the necessity.

Mr. President, coordination is the simplest thing in the world. I venture to give to the Senate a little example which developed recently before the Senate Committee on Commerce. At the very time when one of the bureaus of the Government concerned with war production was making a very loud outcry about its inability to carry out its program on time because of the failure to secure necessary shipments of steel, and the Senate Committee on Commerce was assembled to hear this plaint and see what it could do to remedy it, I happened to have a personal call from a member of the War Industries Board, who came down to the Capitol without any thought of appearing before the committee. I told him of the problem that was pending before the committee, and he said, "Well, why not let me go before your committee; I am concerned myself with the delivery of steel." It was quite a natural thing to do; and so the gentleman, very eminent in his particular line and a very high authority in the distribution and allotment of steel to our varied industries, came before the committee and met the head of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, who was calling for steel. Those two gentlemen had never before met. One was the head of a constructing organization and the other was a very important factor in a distributing organization which had to function before construction could be effected. Well, the moment they came together the difficulty was discussed, and we found that the acting head of a great governmental shipbuilding yard had arrogated to himself the problem of securing deliveries of steel and deliberately ignored the War Industries Board here in the Capital, which was charged with that function. The moment that was discovered the situation was cleared; by this chance meeting of two heads of bureaus coordination began; and that situation was relieved in 48 hours.

How perfectly simple a matter it would have been if somebody in authority in the executive department of the Government had asked of one bureau, "Why are you in trouble?" and, securing its answer, turned to another bureau which is charged with the responsibility of relieving that situation, and said, "Why are not you relieving the troubles," for instance, "of the Emergency Fleet Corporation?" Those two inquiries would have brought about instantly the same coordination that was effected by this chance meeting before the Committee on Commerce. My complaint is that the executive department of the Government has not given the attention that it ought to have given to the problem of coordination.

I am reluctant to speak about this bill, because I am the last man in the Senate, I know, who is inclined to find fault with the administration in this hour of trial. I had ten times rather add a note of confidence to the popular mind than to cry out with a single objection, no matter how well founded. I have no grievance against the President of the United States, and I hope my statement will not be misconstrued when I say that the chief source of lack of coordination in our war activities is the Executive himself. Not by design—I do not pretend to say that—but the Chief Executive of the United States ought to understand that we have finally come to a condition in this country when everybody must do not his bit, but his most and his best; and in order to do things effectively we must have the Executive and the Congress and every bureau working in complete harmony and fullest coordination, and there is not any one person in the world to-day who can effect that so quickly as the President of the United States himself.

Referring again to the pending measure, if the President of the United States would come to Congress and say in person that this most revolutionary legislation is necessary to the winning of the war, I would vote "aye" without a hearing before a committee. I believe I will go further than that. If the President of the United States, who writes very much more effectively than any other occupant of the presidential chair, will only sit down and indite an official message on this subject to the Congress of the United States, I believe I should even then vote to respond to his request. By such a process we should share responsibility. But, Mr. President, I am not going to vote for this revolutionary legislation and take on the shoulders of the Senate alone the responsibility of altering our form of government. Let the President say, "In order to win this war we must change our form of government, and I as Executive will share the responsibility with the Congress," and then we will have a different situation. To avoid that sole assumption of the responsibility on the shoulders of the Congress, I am going to propose at the end of my remarks the amendment which I have sent to the desk, namely, to limit these transfers of functions and commissions of authority to the things that have to do directly with war production and the conduct of the war. I am quite willing to go that far, and I make the proposal because I am going to draw the line in the Senate and before the American people between war activities and war emergencies and the alteration of our civil institutions.

I do not know whether the Senate has stopped to think, as it ought—sometimes I am afraid it has not—that under the stress and anxiety and unavoidable hysteria of war we are, either consciously or unconsciously, changing our long-established American institutions. We are very much altering our form of Federal Government. If any man says to me, "Well, this is only a change for war," I warn him now that 99 per cent of the changes effected in this war emergency will continue after the war, and if they are helpful changes they ought to be continued after the war. I have already said on this floor that in the name of war we have seized the transportation lines of this country, and I stake my reputation as a prophet or as an observer of American tendencies and say now that you will never see them returned. Meanwhile, in the name of war, the seizure is going to go further, and I am not sure but that it is contemplated in this extraordinary grant of power. If it is a good thing I have no serious objection; but, Mr. President, I call attention to this very serious thought—that the tremendous task of altering the civil institutions of the United States of America ought to be done in the deliberations and reflections of peace and not in the stress and strain and anxieties of war.

There has been some little quotation of a former President relating to these matters.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FRANCE. I note that there are but seven Senators present——

Mr. HARDING. I hope the Senator will not ask for a quorum. If the Senator will allow me, I had rather not have a quorum called at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to be interrupted.

Mr. HARDING. I have no disposition to oppose the pending bill by any tactics of delay; and if the Senator from Maryland, whose purpose and courtesy I very greatly appreciate, will only allow me to submit my remarks while the Senators are enjoying their lunches I think my feelings will have been relieved and quite as much accomplished as though more of the Senators were present to hear what I have to say. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] accepts the suggestion with approval, and I thank him.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi just paid the Senator from Ohio a very high compliment.

Mr. HARDING. We all do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator will not object to my having said that he was a very sensible man. That is what I said.

Mr. HARDING. I thank the Senator, because that is a sort of an antidote to a good many things that have been said on this floor that more or less ruffled my feelings, so we will adjust the account along friendly lines.

Getting back to my theme, the Senator in charge of this bill and a number of the Senators who have been speaking in support of it on the floor have quoted a former President of the United States as one who has recommended these changes in our executive institutions.

I do not know that it is important for me to add any further light on this particular phase of the question; but it seems to me it is only justice to a former President, who is a very great patriot and is doing all that he can in support of the war, to put him right in the RECORD. I recall that when the pending bill was first presented to the Congress he contributed a signed editorial to one of the great newspapers of the land, in which he undertook to say some things that are pertinent at this moment. I speak of the Hon. William H. Taft, and I quote him:

> Now, as out of a clear sky the administration, through Senator OVERMAN, has put in a bill to authorize the President "to coordinate and consolidate the executive bureaus, agencies, and offices in the interest of economy and more effective administration of the Government." This seems indeed to have been a "Roland" for the Military Committee "Oliver." It abandons the view that no coordination is necessary and confers a complete and unlimited power of coordination by Executive edict. This has no precedent in the history of the country. The bill gives the President the authority to unite departments or divide them up, to transfer bureaus from one to another department, to consolidate them, to create new ones with new powers, to transfer appropriations for the same function to new agencies; indeed, to melt all the present structure of the great executive departments and divide the molten mass into new departments, bureaus, and agencies for the better carrying on of the war and the more effective exercise of his powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He is given specific authority to employ by Executive order any additional agency or agencies, and to vest therein the performance of such function as he may deem appropriate—

I think it is fair to say, however, that that has been modified in the bill—

> Thus the President may create an office and its duties and appoint a man to fill it in the same Executive order. The only limitation is that the office shall not last longer than the war and the duties of the office created shall have some relation to the carrying on of the war. The whole purpose of the bill seems to be to exclude Congress from any voice in framing the machinery for coordinating war agencies and to exclude the Senate from any power to confirm coordinators. The creation of an office is ordinarily regarded as a legislative function. The Constitution permits Congress to dispense with confirmation by the Senate only in case of "inferior" offices.

And then Mr. Taft goes on to enlarge upon the fact that the adoption of any such measures as the one proposed is the equivalent of Congress submerging itself and turning over all of the power of Congress to the Executive.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that I have the greatest respect for Mr. Taft. It is more than respect. I love him, and without regard to party no man has ever been in the presidential chair for whom I have had a higher respect. I want to say that in passing. I do not want to do him an injustice. I did read from three of his messages to Congress, setting forth that we had an unscientific form of government, and that its activities ought to be coordinated. I was corrected then by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], when I argued that Mr. Taft favored such legislation. The Senator from Pennsylvania said, I think, that he was in the Cabinet at that time, and he understood that the President favored coordination, but he wanted it done by Congress; and the RECORD will show that when the Senator from Pennsylvania said that he knew that to be a fact, I agreed that that was so; that I would not say that Mr. Taft favored it, except to illustrate that in every department of this Government there was confusion, and that the President had asked that there be coordination and concentration.

I want to say that I had no intention of doing Mr. Taft an injustice; and I am only arguing for what he said in these three messages to Congress, and referring to the fact that he himself had abolished a good many revenue offices of this country under the authority Congress had given him, and had abolished customhouse offices under the authority which Congress had given him. I did not intend to misrepresent him.

Mr. HARDING. I understand the point of the Senator from North Carolina, and it dovetails precisely with the line of argument I have tried to follow, namely, that the modification of our governmental system ought to be done in the deliberations and reflections of peace. Mr. Taft's suggestions were made in a time of peace. If I may quote from him one paragraph further in this connection, you will note that he touches on a thing that I have already touched upon and wish to enlarge upon for a moment.

At another place in his editorial Mr. Taft said, referring to the bills proposed by the Military Affairs Committee:

If these bills are not adequate or suitable, why does the President not suggest the changes he wishes in the departments and the bureaus and the new offices or agencies he wishes created? If he or Mr. Baker has any definite plan of better coordination, why should it not be presented for consideration by the legislative branch of the Government and its action in a constitutional way? Not one definite proposal of this sort has been made to Congress.

That is the suggestion of a former very trusted and very patriotic Chief Executive of the Republic, who knows what he is talking about; and it seems to me that it would be a very simple matter for the President to ask of Congress the thing he desires. I said a little while ago that I hope I do not take myself too seriously as a Senator, but I have been thinking of the inconsistency of American argument and thought. We rightfully boast of the Republic; we talk about the inspired fathers and the immortal Constitution, and I agree with that; we felicitate ourselves upon the constant progress in something like a century and a third of American experiment in making stable a popular form of government; in this hour of trial and anxiety we say very much about America giving of her strength and resources and soul and spirit to make the world safe for democracy; and then, quite apart from that, we have been very busy in the last few years, under the influence of leadership more or less of kin to the Chief Executive, in popularizing this branch of the Congress. I think it was under the inspiration of Mr. Bryan that we turned to the election of Senators by popular vote. Mr. Bryan did not discover that scheme. Hamilton advocated it in the Constitutional Convention; but we adopted the popular election of Senators, and then we sanctified it out in my State by primary popular nomination, all the while bringing the Senate a little closer to the people as presumably the great deliberative body of the Republic; and then, in spite of our boastfulness of our popular form of government and the perfection of our plan, the moment we get into embarrassment, the Executive asks the Senate substantially to abdicate. I do not think it is fair, Mr. President, to any self-respecting Member of this body to ask him to vote to put aside the power with which he has been charged in the Constitution, and the responsibility that comes to him with the commission from the people who sent him here.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I was only going to make the observation to the Senator that in the Parliament of Great Britain and in the Parliament of France, while they did give these great executive powers to the officers in charge of the Government, nevertheless they retained at the same time the power, by a vote of no confidence, to change a ministry and to put in charge executive officers who would conduct the affairs of government in accordance with the better public opinion of the country. We do not have that system here, but I think we ought to have it. I think we ought to have an arrangement by which a vote of no confidence could be declared by Congress, and in that way lead to the retirement of any official appointed by the President to discharge these great functions, which would prevent an abuse of these powers by inefficiency, or incompetence, or any other objectionable feature.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I do not want to elaborate on the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma, but I venture to say, in addition, if we had either the English or French system in this country we would have a different ministry than we have at the present time, and I am not quite sure but that we would long since have corrected some of the things which it is designed to alter by the passage of this bill.

Mr. President, I want to have it perfectly understood that I do not want to stand upon the floor of the Senate and find fault with any particular bureau or individual in any particular department of the Government. There has been some direction of thought along lines very unfair in that particular. Some one very high in authority has said that the investigations of the Congress have not been patriotically inspired, and that they were designed to furnish information for some future partisan advantage. I am just a little weary of the man who talks about seeking partisan advantage on the part of a minority. There has not been a President of the United States from Washington to Wilson who had such cordial support on the part of the Congress as the Chief Executive of to-day, and I rejoice to say from the minority side of this Chamber the support of the administration in all its war measures by the minority has been cordial and almost unanimous. But I do not understand that that sort of a consecration to the cause of the war requires a Member on either side of this Chamber to follow every suggestion of the Chief Executive regarding our institutions of peace.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HARDING. If you please, I submit the following amendments, and I will address myself, if I may with the Chair's permission, to the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, page 1, after the word "agencies," insert the words "having to do directly with war production or the conduct of the war"; in line 3, page 2, after the word "officer," insert the words "having to do directly with war production or the conduct of the war"; in line 24, page 2, after the word "law," insert the words "having to do directly with war production or the conduct of the war"; in line 1, page 3, after the word "officer," insert the words "having to do directly with war production or the conduct of the war."

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator may intend to discuss it, but I merely wish to ask if he does not think that is covered by the proviso on page 2 reported by the committee?

Mr. HARDING. No; I do not think so, answering the Senator from Washington. I have taken deliberate pains to make this amendment as restrictive as possible and still give the grant of authority. I have therefore employed the language "having directly to do with war production or the conduct of the war." I will very willingly admit, Senators, that even in that language the amendment is a very broad one, and that the Chief Executive, if he desired so to do, could reach out very far in the various branches of the Government to exercise his authority on the assumption that it had to do directly with the conduct of the war. But I am willing to go so far, Senators, as to grant this authority, and then if there is any abuse of it, let the blame be on the executive head. I have never thought at any time that the Executive would abuse any grant of power contained in this bill, but it is a very singular thing, Senators, if there is no intended exercise of this power, that every suggested restriction should be declined. I do not remember who said it, but I want to indorse the sentiment that power ought not be granted unless it is expected to have it exercised. Somebody has said that more effectively, but you will get the thought. I want, if I can, to share the burdens of this tremendous time with the Executive. This bill is so directly involved that I must speak of it. I would like to retain just a semblance of respect for the Congress, not only in the estimate of the American people, but in the estimate of those whom Congress has provided places for here in the Capital of the Republic. I know of nothing more disgusting to public service in the Senate than the attitude of bureau heads and bureau employees toward the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I was in one of the departments in Washington a few months ago when an Assistant Secretary had the effrontery to say to me, a Member of the Senate, not with personal application, that they could get along very well with the progress of certain Government undertakings if it were not for the interference of the "numskulls on Capitol Hill."

I very recently had a much more perturbing experience. There is pending in this body a bill proposing to appropriate $60,000,000 under a Government housing program. In my State there is a great industry concerned with the construction of houses, and their material is very much needed in this program, and it might very fittingly be given at least a square deal, because it conserves the supply of iron in construction. Through some influence or other the gentlemen who are to have this task in charge have written in their specifications a condition that bars the industry from my State from participating in this housing program. I ventured to address a letter to the department asking if there could not be a correction of the specifications, which should conform to the municipal building codes of the country and admit this material. The head of the department to which we are to commit the task of spending $60,000,000 had the effrontery in making reply to say to me, "I hope you will ask me to do nothing further in this matter." That is the reply of one who is to spend $60,000,000 of Government money to a Member of the Senate who asks only for a square deal and a conserving program in such an undertaking.

It seems to me that Congress might reasonably assert itself, and then if we want to give a real example to the country of coordination and cooperation and consecration, let the Chief Executive and Congress get a little closer together. It would not be an anstonishing spectacle——

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish the Senator would state the name of that man. I think whenever any head of a department treats a Senator of the United States disrespectfully his name ought to be known, and he should be cut off the pay roll. I myself have insisted on that course.

Mr. HARDING. It is no trouble at all. I am glad to oblige the Senator. I refer to Mr. Eidlitz, who has charge of the housing program.

Mr. OVERMAN. What position does he occupy?

Mr. HARDING. He has charge of the housing program.

Mr. OVERMAN. He ought to be taken care of.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I fear my time is rapidly expiring, and I may say in concluding, if the Senate will adopt the amendments I have proposed, while I am frank to say these amendments will not in any way bring about the limitations of powers that I would desire, it will at least have the seeming effect of preserving our civil institutions from the revolutionary processes of war. It seems to me the United States Senate, boasting of our institutions and respecting itself, ought to place that limitation on the bill, and if with such a limitation as that the Chief Executive will come just a little closer to the legislative branch of the Government and take the Senate collectively, not individually, into his confidence, and give to America the spectacle of one of the people coordinating and cooperating with this collective body of representatives of the people, giving the American thought and patriotism and energy to the completest prosecution of the war, it will do more to enlist American confidence and add to the spirit of American determination than anything which could be done.

I think we need just a little stronger committal to this task we have undertaken. I want the Executive to have the power needed to lead us on to a peace with victory and nothing less, Senators; but if we are going to go in that direction, let us not go at the sacrifice of the inherited institutions of this Republic. Let us not in this moment of anxiety and more or less hysteria completely overturn the things that we have boasted in the past, all because there has been individual failure in the processes of bringing the several branches of the Government into closer coordination and cooperation.

I hope the Senate, out of respect to itself and out of assurance to the people of the United States that we have not lost our heads in this hour of peril, and out of challenge to the monarchs of Europe that a republic can be preserved in time of war and made capable of defense and offense, will let us preserve these institutions with so much of a safeguard, if we may, as is contained in the amendment that I have submitted to the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I always listen to the Senator from Ohio with great interest, and I agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that he is a very wise man. The Senator used one expression, and I should like to know what he meant by it and what he intended to convey. He said this bill is designed to cover up something.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, there has been a constant succession of mistakes, not unnatural, from the very beginning of this war. There has been failure here and failure there, and the perfectly manly thing to do would be for the responsible heads to acknowledge that mistakes have been made and proceed to correct them under existing authority.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will let me say——

Mr. HARDING. I want to answer the question completely. I did not mean to offer any inference of crookedness or scandal. There will be always scandal under any government in a time of war. In the enormous processes of production and expenditure it is absolutely unavoidable, and there are cormorants by land and sea that hover wherever there is a sanguinary conflict. But the mistakes we have made have been mistakes in putting into responsible positions men who are not fitted for them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, would it not have been fairer if the Senator had said this bill is intended to correct those mistakes than to say it is designed to cover them? Does he not think it is unjust? He has made a charge. If he can show me that this bill was designed to cover up something——

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I will not permit that meaning to be attributed to me. I do not mean that it is a bill to cover up mistakes. I mean it is a bill, if you please, to correct the errors and put the responsibility of the errors on Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am glad the Senator said that, because he used the words "to cover up."

Mr. HARDING. Since it is drawn out at this time, if the Senator will allow me in his time, I want to emphasize another reason for objecting.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have but a short time, but I want to know what the Senator meant by this bill covering up something, and that there is a design to cover up something. The bill does not cover up; it is to correct errors. That is what it is intended to do.

Mr. HARDING. Let me see if I can make it explicit. There have been numberless errors on the part of department heads and others in authority.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARDING. It would have been a very simple thing to have corrected these errors by removals and changes such as have recently been made by Executive authority. It would also be possible to have corrected mistaken policies. But the Executive has not seen fit to make that acknowledgment and make all the necessary corrections, and he asks at the hands of Congress this blanket authority in order to say to the people of the Republic that he has been a victim of conditions heretofore that he could not correct, but under the authority granted by this bill he will bring about the necessary changes. I say that that is an unfair position to take. I have not at any time attributed to the President nor to any department head anything that is dishonorable or irregular.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am glad the Senator has corrected himself, because, as the Senator will admit, when he said this bill was designed to cover up something it was a very unjust imputation. The Senator has also said if the President had said to him, this bill was to be used in the interest of the national defense to support this country he would vote for anything, not only this bill but for giving any other power. He has forgotten perhaps what the bill says. I will read it again. This is said to be an administration measure. The bill is "for the national security and defense." It is asked to be given "for the successful prosecution of the war." It is asked "for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief." I thought when the bill was introduced that that was a sufficient limitation as to war powers.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator knows that the Executive has established a practice of addressing Congress in person. The Senator knows that it is a practice from time immemorial in the history of the Republic for the Executive to send his written messages to Congress. I have no desire in any way to discredit the Senator from North Carolina, but here is a revolutionary measure. There have been a thousand things proposed——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDING. Just a moment; I want to finish this. There have been ten thousand things proposed to the Congress in written or spoken messages on the part of the Chief Executive of less importance than this measure. Why should not the Executive come to Congress and let it understand officially that he wants this authority and share with Congress the responsibility for the proposed changes?

Mr. OVERMAN. I deny that this is a revolutionary measure, and I deny that Congress has in any way by this bill abdicated any power. I am tired of hearing Senators talk about the abdication of power, when we have it in our power after the bill is signed to repeal it, when we have the whole machinery of legislation here that gave the power, and nothing on God's earth is asked for in this bill except what? To exercise power which Congress already has given. I will ask the Senator, Is there anything in the bill asked for that Congress itself has not granted?

Mr. HARDING. I quite agree with that, Mr. President, but in the exercise of granted functions by the transfer of authority and the elimination of certain Government agencies and the concentration in other agencies you turn the Government over to the administrative establishment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think that is a fair argument. You have got to trust the President. He is honest; he is an able man. You have got to trust everybody in every position, and we are bound to trust the President to do right and do it in the interest of what the bill says.

Now, my friend has introduced this amendment. It was brought and argued before the committee and the limitation expressed in the first section was considered sufficient to limit the President to do those things only as to war measures in the interest of carrying on the war. Some Senators on that committee thought it was specific enough and differed from my friend from Ohio. I really suggested the amendment which we placed in the bill making it absolutely specific. It was argued in the committee for two or three days. We said this authority should be given and it should be limited to the prosecution of the war and the successful defense, support, and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources, and so forth. That was sufficient. What is the use to put anything else in? But some Senators had a doubt about it and said it should be more specific. Now, what should we do? Listen:

That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only—

Absolutely. We put the word "only" in there—

That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

We have to trust the President to carry out the law.

Mr. President, we also have another limitation. The Senator from Ohio objected to making it 12 months. I told him that I was willing to make it 6 months. I believe the Senator from Washington also raised that objection. That was limited. What other limitation is there? This whole act ceases to be of effect after the war. It is limited only to the war.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. If that is the real purpose, and I accept the Senator's statement, what can be the real objection to making it more emphatic?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it is more emphatic now than the Senator's amendment would make it. I think it is emphatic, and I am opposed to the amendment. I think it only confuses by adding the same words in half a dozen sections about the same thing. That is why I am opposed to it.

Senators talk about the abdication of power. This, I say, is not only limited to the war but the President can only transfer the powers Congress has already given. Where is there any abdication of power in doing that? Wherein does the abdication come? What powers have we abdicated except that the President is made by the Constitution the executive officer? He is compelled by his oath of office to execute the powers that Congress has given him. That is all this bill seeks to do. It is to let him execute the authority Congress has given him. Do you tell me that that is abdicating power? What power do we abdicate? I should like the Senator to state what power we have abdicated to the President. It is a power that has been given by Congress already, and we let him under his oath of office in time of war execute that which the Constitution compels him to do. Now, where is there any abdication of power?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OVERMAN. I always gladly yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that be so, does not the Senator's argument against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio apply in this case? If the President has all this power why do you emphasize it by adding to it in passing another bill? That is the answer the Senator made to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said the Senator from Ohio said we had abdicated the power. I want him to tell me what power we are abdicating? Can the Senator from New Hampshire tell me?

Mr. GALLINGER. I could tell the Senator a hundred.

Mr. OVERMAN. Tell me some power that we are abdicating.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not suppose that the matter was in question.

Mr. OVERMAN. You can not answer it. It has not been answered as to any power we are abdicating. We are giving the power to the Executive to transfer and redistribute functions that Congress has already given him, and that is the limitation. It is surrounded by this limitation everywhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not follow the Senator in that argument, because if we are not giving to the President more power than he had before, why on earth has the Senate been spending weeks on this bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator does not understand the bill. The bill authorizes the President for the interests of the war to distribute powers that have already been given him. That is what it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they have been already given, what more on earth can he have by the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. The powers have been given him, but he can not coordinate and bring them together in the interests of justice and economy and the more efficient manner of fighting the war.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me just a word, I think I understand the bill; but I do not understand the reasoning of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am sorry the Senator like some other Senators has not read the bill. He has read it, but he has not digested it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am always glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under the bill the power is given to transfer the duties of officers confirmed by the Senate to officers who have not been confirmed by the Senate. Does the Senator think we yield no responsible authority when we permit the functions of the Government to be transferred to men who have not been confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. The function Congress has already provided. It is a question of law that I am talking about. Senators say it is an abdication by Congress when it is only the law Congress has passed that we permit him to exercise.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to give the Senator from North Carolina one example. When we were discussing the war finance corporation bill the Senator went to a great deal of trouble to arrange that the licensing committee should be under the control of the Senate in respect to confirmation. If this bill is passed, that authority can be transferred by the President of the United States and the Senate can not say him nay. We will have no more to do with passing on the qualifications of that bureau than on some institution over in China.

Mr. OVERMAN. As I said, when we transfer it to some other man he exercises what power? No more and no less than the statute gives. Senators talk too much about men. Senators talk about Mr. Creel and talk about confirming a man. Under this bill nothing can be done in the way of the increase of power, but you transfer it from one man who is not efficient to an efficient man, and he can not distribute any power except what Congress has given.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can hardly think the Senator from North Carolina means all that he says. His intellectual processes are usually accurate and luminous, but I think he is now in fault. The Senator from North Carolina says that we are not abandoning or granting any legislative power in this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say we are giving nothing but authority to transfer functions already granted.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina said the bill contained no abdication, if you please, of legislative or congressional power. Let me put this case to him. At this time Congress and Congress alone has the power to transfer the duties of the War office to the Navy office. Is not that true?

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator mean under this bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I mean at this time Congress alone has power to transfer the duties of the War Department to the Department of the Navy.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know. The Senator is better informed about that than I am. Congress established the War Department; it established the Navy Department. Congress established the War Department with certain limitations; it established the Navy Department with certain limitations. If the War Department has half a dozen purchasing agents and the Navy Department has also purchasing agents, under this bill, Congress having already created the purchasing agents, and there is the limitation, the President is authorized to transfer the functions. That is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us keep to the point. Congress has established a War Department and a Navy Department, and it has given to each of them certain powers which at this time can be exercised only by the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively. Now, we are proposing to give to the President the power to transfer the functions, powers, and duties of one of those departments to the other.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, what function?

Mr. CUMMINS. All the functions that Congress has reposed in either of the departments.

Mr. OVERMAN. Who gave those functions?

Mr. CUMMINS. Congress gave the functions.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the point I am making.

Mr. CUMMINS. The point, though, is not good, if I may remind the Senator from North Carolina of that fact. The power that we are giving up is the power to assign the functions of one of these departments to the other. It may be wise or unwise, but the Senator from North Carolina must certainly see that we are granting our entire control over the exercise of power by the persons to whom we have heretofore granted the power.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is transferred is power which has been granted by Congress and Congress alone, and therefore we do not abdicate our power. We allow the President to make certain transfers of power. Who is the President? He is the Executive under the Constitution. Congress makes the laws; the President executes them. That is what the writers on elementary law tell us. Now, when we confer this power we allow the President to exercise it by a redistribution of these functions. That is what the bill says.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is just as much a legislative power, however, to declare who shall exercise the power as to define the power itself.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, we are asking that the President may exercise the power that Congress has granted by transferring incompetent men and replacing them by competent men, by transferring from one department to another power that Congress has given. Therefore, there can not be any abdication of power on the part of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not, perhaps, be a better plan if there is an incompetent man at the head of one of these places to remove him?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is begging the question. I should like to have some one tell me what power we have abdicated. It can not be done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We have abdicated the legislative power.

Mr. OVERMAN. There it is again. My question is, Will the Senator tell me some power we have abdicated under this bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We have abdicated all our powers.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says we have abdicated all of our powers, and yet he can not tell me wherein we have done so when the bill itself says it is only designed for the purpose of permitting a transfer of power that Congress has already granted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not talking about the purpose of the bill; I am talking about the language of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am talking about the language of the bill. It provides for a redistribution of functions which have already been granted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It proposes to take away jurisdiction from one department and confer it on another.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says that it is a transfer of power; but where has Congress abdicated its power? How does Congress abdicate the powers when it has already given them? It is only for the purpose of transferring a power that Congress has given.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Because Congress has given powers to specific agencies and departments, now you propose to allow the President, under the guise of calling it rules and regulations, to make new statutes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suppose what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] mean is that we are attempting to abdicate legislative powers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; impotently. The Supreme Court of the United States will attend to it, though, after we get through. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, there is no such thing as the legislature in fact delegating legislative powers. We may attempt it in this bill—though I do not think we are—but if we are attempting it, we are attempting a vain thing, because it will ultimately be declared so. I do not care to enter upon an argument at length of this question, but I desire to say that I do not think we are abdicating any legislative power.

There is no doubt, Mr. President, but under the decisions which have been rendered by the Supreme Court time and time again since the Aurora case, away back in 1807, Congress could, for instance, pass a law which would authorize the suspension of the functions of any one of the departments, or all the functions of a department, if the President should deem it in the public interest to have them so suspended. It has been decided time and time again that the functions of a law may be entirely suspended upon the judgment of some agency designated by the Congress to determine when they should be suspended. And that determination may rest upon nothing more than that he deems it in the interest of the public welfare. If we may pass a law authorizing the suspension of all the functions of some department if the Chief Executive should deem it essential to the public welfare that they should be suspended, we can certainly pass a law authorizing the transfer of the functions of one department to another through the same agency and for the same reason. I do not believe that, under the decisions to which I have referred, we are abdicating any power. If we are attempting to do so, there is one thing very clear, and that is that it will be futile in the end. But I do not accept the theory that we are attempting to do so. An unbiased and dispassionate consideration of the measure in the light of the decisions must bring an investigator to that conclusion, it seems to me.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. How is the Senate going to escape its responsibility of confirming important legislative administrative officers?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not believe this bill provides for any such a proposition. Of course, we could not abdicate that power. If the law when enacted should be so executed—which, in my judgment, would be in violation of the plain terms of the bill—that that should be effectuated, it would be a void act, and would be so declared. If some officer exercising a function for which he must be confirmed should undertake to exercise that function without confirmation, his official authority could be tested in a proper proceeding.

But, Mr. President, let us recall for a moment some of the things which Congress has already done in the way of the so-called abdication of power. Take, for instance, the tariff law which we passed a number of years ago. In that law we provided that if the President should deem it proper he might suspend the provisions of the law entirely as to any nation which he thought was not treating us fairly in commercial matters. That law depended entirely for its execution, upon its vitality or its nonvitality, upon what the President deemed to be wise or deemed to be fair as between two nations of the earth. We provided specifically that if any country should deal with our exports under such conditions or with such tariffs upon them as seemed to be unfair to us, the President of the United States might suspend the law entirely as to that country. If, on the other hand, he should deem that they had brought themselves within the limits of fair practice, the law should again go into force upon his proclamation.

There, Mr. President, was upon the face of it an apparent effort to delegate power. The law was to have no effect except upon the will or discretion of the President; yet the Supreme Court of the United States held that, we having selected an agent upon whose discretion we were willing to rely, and having designated that, his discretion being in full force, he should suspend or execute the law, it was not a delegation of power, because Congress itself had said when it should go into effect, to wit, upon the discretion of the President, and when it should not be in effect, also dependent upon the discretion of the President. It seems to me that we have not done anything more than that here; indeed, I do not think we have gone nearly so far.

I hope the Senator will bear in mind that when a transfer does take place, when a function is transferred, that function must be functioned according to the law which we have made. If all the duties of the Department of Justice were transferred to the postmaster of Washington, he would still have to perform those duties and functions in accordance with the law which we have made. The agency would simply be changed, and it would be changed solely upon the authority of and by reason of the instruction of the Congress of the United States.

I am frank to say that when this bill first came up for consideration this was the one proposition with which I was concerned, because I made up my mind, if it was a delegation of power, not only we should not make that delegation but we should not attempt it. Listen to this language——

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask from what the Senator is going to read?

Mr. BORAH. I shall read from Field against Clark, in One hundred and forty-third United States.

SEC. 3. That, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January, 1892, whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the Government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States which, in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable.

Observe the latitude that is there given to the President. Whenever he deems any transaction between this Nation and any other as being unequal or unreasonable or unfair, he may suspend the duty which Congress has imposed, and when he deems that they have brought themselves back within that law, he may impose the duty.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDING. I should like the Senator from Idaho to say whether he thinks the making of the Executive an agency for the suspension of the operation of a tariff law is comparable in its effect to a measure which places the whole civil fabric in the hands of the Executive to change it as he sees fit?

Mr. BORAH. So far as the principle is concerned, and the question of whether or not we are delegating power, with all due respect to the able Senator from Ohio, I do not believe there is any distinction.

It may be that, by reason of the magnitude of the task which we are imposing upon the President, or the magnitude of the power which we are giving him under this direction, a different question would arise that would relate alone to the wisdom or to the policy of our action; but, as to the delegation of power, enabling him to say whether or not a function shall be performed by this department or by that department, in my judgment, is not to be compared as a test of the delegation of power with the power of the President to say whether or not a law passed by the Congress shall be operative against a foreign country so far as imports are concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator, Is it not a much stronger case for this reason? It was argued in the case of Field against Clark that there was an express transfer of legislative power in regard to a peculiarly legislative matter, and for that reason it was void, whereas the powers granted under this bill are purely executive and administrative.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. Permit me to call the attention of Senators to an early case in regard to this matter, whence all this authority seems to flow:

> The authority given to the President by the act of June 4, 1794, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States "whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require."

Now, the laying of an embargo is peculiarly and distinctly within the legislative duties and functions of a government, and it seems to have been conceded that that could not have been done without authority from Congress; but Congress authorized an agent whom it chose as the proper agency to determine when the embargo should be laid. What was the effect of that embargo which was laid by the President and taken off by the President? It practically demoralized the business of this country; it practically reduced all of New England to bankruptcy; it established a law of commerce throughout this part of the world; it, indeed, brought us into conflict with other nations of the earth; and yet upon the option or upon the discretion, or upon what the President deemed to be in the interest of the public safety, he was permitted to control the commerce of the country under the laws which Congress had theretofore seen fit to pass.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HARDING. When the Congress made this grant it knew the specific object in mind, whereas we are proposing to grant power without one single suggestion of the thing to be accomplished.

Mr. BORAH. I will come to that in a moment, but I can not quite agree with the Senator upon that point. Again:

> By the act of February 9, 1799, to remit and discontinue, for the time being, the restraints and prohibitions which Congress had prescribed with respect to commercial intercourse with the French Republic, "if he shall deem it expedient"—
> Expedient—
> "and consistent with the interest of the United States," and "to revoke such order whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the United States shall require."

In other words, Congress placed in the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in the crisis which confronted us in our relations with France the sole power of determining when commerce should come into this country and when it should not.

Mr. President, I do not think this bill goes even so far, because, as stated by the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], we are now dealing alone with executive agencies and matters over which the President has supervision and control already by specific acts of the legislature.

The virtue of this bill consists in the fact that we do not suspend, nor give the President the power to suspend, the functions of any department. We say, "You may select this department and you may transfer an agency to that department; but when it is transferred the function of the agency shall be the same as that prescribed by the Congress of the United States." If this law is carried out in accordance with its intent and in accordance with its plain language, not a single syllable of any statute passed by Congress will be disregarded in the functioning of the different departments.

I say this much, Mr. President, in justification of those who are supporting this bill. I do not think that it is a delegation of power; but, weak as my argument may be, and incomplete as my reasoning may be, nevertheless I would not want to be understood, under any circumstances, as undertaking to delegate to the President of the United States any function which belongs to the Congress of the United States. I never intend at any time during this war to vote for a measure which I believe to be unconstitutional. The able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has said that, in his opinion there is very little need for this proposed law; that practically all that the President can do under it can be done without it; that we are adding very little to the powers of the President. To use his language, that we are simply providing him crutches when he already has wings with which to soar as the Chief Executive and as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. So I say that those of us who are supporting this measure have no idea that we are voting for a measure which has the effect of delegating legislative power to the President of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is unquestionably sound. I am unable to perceive anything that would justify the impression that Congress in passing this bill is abdicating any of its functions or surrendering any of its powers. We are going nothing which can not be undone to-morrow or later, if in the wisdom of the Congress it should be undone. The vast power, in other words, which this bill imposes upon the President, a power enabling him to rearrange the functions and bureaus of the Government, can not be an abdication if that power can be destroyed or changed by the same body which confers it. When a king abdicates his throne his right to it is gone; he can not resume it; the term "abdication" practically conveys the idea of abandonment; and we can not abdicate that which we do not abandon. I fully agree, too, that if this bill is one which involves an abdication or surrender of legislative authority, that fact makes it eo ipso invalid, because the moment we attempt to do it we attempt to surrender something which it is not within our power to surrender, and consequently it is unthinkable that we are deliberately doing that.

Mr. President, an administrative incident has recently occurred which I think illustrates the wisdom of the argument of the Senator from Idaho. The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; his power as such is absolute. The other day the exigencies at the front required a unification of command, and Gen. Foch was made the commander in chief of all the allied forces. The President of the United States approved that action, and by that approval he bestowed for the time being upon Gen. Foch, an alien to America, a foreigner, the power which he possesses; or, rather, he transferred that power for the time.

No man questions the right of the President to place for the time being, or as long as may be necessary, the chief command over the forces of America in France in the hands of a foreigner. By so doing he does not abdicate his authority as Commander in Chief and he does not surrender the power of command given to him under the Constitution, for he may resume it and will resume it whenever the emergency passes, which required this exercise of power. Now, to say that this bill amounts to a surrender of legislative power to the President is also to say that when the President approved the appointment of Gen. Foch he abdicated and surrendered his power as Commander in Chief of our Army in France; yet that seems to me impossible. There is not a man in this body, Mr. President, who does not commend with all his heart the appointment of Gen. Foch and the approval of that appointment by the President of the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to continue at length the discussion of this question; it is manifest to me, from what has transpired in this Chamber, that the Senate has made up its mind, and is only waiting an opportunity to express to the world its conclusion and put the stamp of its approval upon what is known as the Overman bill. There are some things, however, which I desire to touch upon briefly.

I wish to say, at the outset, Mr. President, that one of the most gratifying signs of the times is the utter absence in the Senate of partisan spirit and partisan bias in considering measures that have to do with the conduct of the stupendous conflict in which our country is now engaged. The spirit embodied in the imperishable words of the immortal Webster, "Let our object be our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country," fills every breast and breathes through every word uttered by Senators upon this floor.

Senators may differ on economic problems, they may be swayed by partisan interests in the consideration of ordinary matters of legislation, their judgments may vary regarding the performance of routine duties, but in purpose and intent, regarding the prosecution of the war, there is perfect unanimity, and the end to be attained is the common goal to which we are all striving. Such is the splendid spectacle which this distinguished body presents to the world to-day. It must be inspiring to our masters, the people at home, and comforting to our allies across the sea.

Mr. President, the shallow-brained creature, drunk with egotism, suffering with an acute case of autogeneal infallibility, who pretends to possess a corner on all patriotism, while questioning the capacity of other Senators to understand the great measures that we are considering, and also sneeringly expresses doubt ever and anon of the loyalty of his fellows, fills my soul with mingled feelings of pity and contempt. It is the habit of this creature in his intercourse with his fellows to—

> Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
> And without sneering teach the rest to sneer:
> Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
> Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike.

In all the annals of the world's history this peculiar type of man has been developed, the unfortunate incident to an abnormal state of things. If I may be permitted a personal reference, I should like to say that I have made it a rule of conduct throughout my entire life to concede to every man freedom of thought, honesty of purpose, and the unproscribed privilege of free speech. My knowledge of human nature causes me to indulge the presumption that my fellow man in the main is going to do what is right or is doing the proper thing under the circumstances according to the lights before him. I ask for myself no more than I concede to my fellows.

Much has been said about the defeat of this bill being construed as questioning the ability, integrity of purpose, and patriotism of the President of the United States. For myself, I desire to say that I regard the present President of the United States as a man of unusual ability, of wide reading, profound study, and as a man of letters the peer of any living American. His genius for expression, coupled with the maturity of his ideas upon matters generally, make his speeches and writings most attractive reading; but I do not think Mr. Wilson, with all of his learning, capable of grasping in detail the great multiplicity of questions or functions which must necessarily be performed at this time in the name of the President. No human intellect could possibly grasp and comprehend all of these questions, and he must therefore necessarily delegate authority to some one else, and that some one else is going to use the authority delegated according to his conception of the requirements of the situation, and, I fear, in many instances not in accord with the high ideals, not always in keeping with the ethical principles and the broad patriotism which must necessarily influence the President and characterize his conduct in the performance of his peculiar functions. It is a mistake for the Congress to legislate with the idea that the person who is to administer or execute the law is possessed of omniscience or the godly quality of infallibility. There is no divinity which hedges about the officeholder that exempts him from the errors common to mortals. And this is true of Presidents as well as constables.

The votes that I have cast on the amendments to the pending bill were not induced by any lack of confidence in the integrity, learning, or patriotism of President Wilson. They were induced rather by a desire to preserve free government and save for posterity our constitutional system unimpaired, and transmit to the generations to follow the glorious heritage which our forefathers bequeathed to us. I am going to indulge the presumption that the President is going to do his duty as God gives him the power to understand it. If I ever had any doubt about the President performing his duty under the powers conferred by the pending bill those doubts were removed when the able, industrious, and pertinacious Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] gave the Senate the assurance that the President would not interfere with the Federal Reserve Board, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or, indeed, any other of the agencies of government which have been established as the result of time, trial, experimentation, and the best judgment of American statesmanship, and which do not relate to the conduct of the war. I am quite sure the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has authority to speak for the President and to bind him mentally and morally on all matters pertaining to the enforcement of this proposed law, although, indeed, the President needs no one to stand sponsor for him in order to command my confidence.

No; I am not afraid to trust President Wilson, but since the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board are not to be interfered with there can be no reason why the right to interfere with them, to abolish them, to disorganize them, temporarily perhaps, should be incorporated in the pending bill. It is unwise to legislate with the view of conferring power upon anybody, however learned and wise that person may be, to do a thing which the judgment of the Congress declares should not be done. I do not believe there are a dozen Members of this body who think that the President should abolish either of these two boards or interfere in any way with the orderly performance of their respective functions.

Now, if it is an expression of confidence in the President that you desire, I am willing and rather prefer that the confidence be expressed in a measure which could possibly do no harm, and I might add if a resolution embodying that idea shall be introduced I shall with great pleasure vote for it.

It has been said by the able, eloquent, and splendidly equipped Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the erudite, eloquent Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and the profound student of public questions, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], that we are not legislating with the view of having the laws enforced solely and exclusively by the present occupant of the White House. Mr. President, we must realize that the tenure of man on this earth is limited. In the midst of life we are in death; changes come with marvelous rapidity; and tragic mutations characterize the course of everything in this life. If the silver cord which binds Woodrow Wilson to earth should be snapped, we do not know who will succeed him. We do not know what influence may control the directing hand. We do not know what disasters might be in store for the country if that sad event—and God save the Republic from such a disaster—should befall the Nation. It is well, therefore, at all times to legislate with prudence, and I submit more necessary to move with care and circumspection to-day, in the shadow of a world disaster, than in normal times. The world is wild, daft, crazed with a blood lust and greed for gain; a storm rages in every brain; and the accelerated heartbeats, on account of the succession of disasters which come to us on every wind, renders impossible calm, dispassionate thinking.

I would confer only such powers as are absolutely necessary to the successful conduct of this war, and I would confer these powers only as they are needed. If it shall appear that further powers are necessary to be conferred upon the Chief Executive, let Congress remain in session and stand ready to delegate those powers.

The learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] announced a few days ago, in a very able and eloquent speech delivered in this Chamber, that—> the whole theory of the democratic government is that the people intrusted with power should be carefully limited, because the theory of our ancestors—and it is a good theory to-day—was that human nature is too weak to be trusted with unlimited power, and that when it is intrusted with unlimited power the rights of the people are in danger.

And let me say that every word the distinguished Senator uttered quoted above is pregnant with vital, essential truth.

The immortal Thomas Jefferson, the variety of whose information, far-reaching vision and superb judgment surpassed any statesman of modern times, who lived in the morning of our national life, thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the men who gave this Government being, and christened it with their patriotism and love, said:

"The will of the people is the only legitimate foundation of any government and to protect its free expression should be our first object. * * * The first principle of a good government is certainly a distribution of its powers into executive, judiciary, and legislative, and a subdivision of the latter into two or three branches. * * * No government can continue good but under the control of the people. * * * Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established, should not be changed for light and transient causes. * * * Unless the mass retains sufficient control over those entrusted with the powers of their government, these will be perverted to their own oppression, and to the perpetuation of wealth and power in the individuals and their families selected for the trust. Whether our Constitution has hit on the exact degree of control necessary is yet under experiment; and it is a most encouraging reflection that distance and other difficulties securing us against the brigand governments of Europe, in the safe enjoyment of our farms and firesides, the experiment stands a better chance of being satisfactorily made here than on any occasion yet presented by history."

I might proceed without limit to quote from this inexhaustible storehouse of wisdom; but the above is sufficient to make clear my idea, and to direct as I would if permitted the course of the Senate in the further consideration of this question.

Mr. President, we all understand the influences which surround men in high places. We are all familiar with the weaknesses of humanity, the fallibility of the flesh. We know the avidity with which man is inclined to reach out for more power, and we know from the stories of the past just what the ambitions of men have cost the masses of humanity in blood and treasure. I would limit the President's authority as I would limit the authority of the Members of this body and of the other House in the performance of their official functions, and I would be more careful in fixing those limitations under present conditions than I would in normal times. The stream has overflowed its banks; the flood rushes ruthlessly to the sea; it is therefore well, if we would save the farms and happy homes that dot the landscape in the valley, the dikes should be made stronger and stronger still. The only person that we can afford to give unlimited power, or rather, unproscribed freedom of action, is the private citizen, who is the source of all power in this Republic. But it seems to me, Mr. President, that the private citizens, whose toil produces the wealth of this country and maintains its commerce in time of peace, and whose strong arm is keeping aloft the Nation's flag in the war-cursed State of France, is the only person whose functions, whose privileges, whose rights, the Congress is inclined to curtail or limit.

But, Mr. President, the vote taken on Saturday indicates the temper of the Senate on this measure. I am going to accept the judgment of the Senate, and I am going to vote for this bill, whatever amendments may be adopted. If the President thinks he needs the powers to successfully conduct the war, I am going to resolve the doubt in favor of the bill and let him have them. I trust that all may be well for the Republic in the end. I am determined that it shall not be said of me, after we have entered this war, that I have denied the President any power thought necessary to bring success to our arms.

Congress has imposed upon the Chief Executive enormous responsibilities. They are enough to crush a weaker man.

I hope the President, in the providence of God, may be able to meet the requirements of the moment and to prevent designing politicians and job hunters who flock around him like the vultures around Prometheus, from taking advantage of the unsettled conditions of the present to promote their pecuniary interest and private political aspirations. I hope the President will be able to listen only to the righteous and to put behind him the dangerous advisers who will take advantage of this emergency to promote their own well-being at the expense of the public interest. I want the President to have every conceivable power necessary to meet the obligations which have been imposed upon him, and I shall not with my vote withhold from him any legitimate, proper authority which the exigencies of the hour demand should be conferred upon him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this bill is soon to be passed, I apprehend, and I hope it will be pretty nearly the end of legislation of this kind at this session of Congress.

It surprised me very much to have the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the acting chairman of the committee, say that we have not delegated any additional power to the President in the bills that we have been passing from time to time. I do not believe the Senator from North Carolina can make the country believe that, notwithstanding he apparently has persuaded himself on that point that such is the fact.

This very day a very prominent Member of the majority made the suggestion to me that he hoped, after this bill had passed, that we could look after the appropriation bills and adjourn Congress. I said to him that that met with my cordial approval, and that I trusted the majority would so shape matters that we could get away from the heated term in Washington in a reasonable time this summer. But, Mr. President, looking at bills lying on my desk, it seems to me that if we are going to take up some other bills that have been introduced by distinguished Members of the majority, instead of felicitating ourselves that we will have a few weeks or months in which to rest from the duties that we have been discharging so earnestly and arduously, we would better send for our winter clothes and conclude that we are going to be here until the next session of Congress.

Mr. President, I find on my desk, among others, two bills that have attracted my attention. Of course, it may be said that they will not be acted on. They are before committees of the Senate and House, having been introduced by prominent and influential Members of this body and the other one, and I apprehend that they may be pushed for consideration before we adjourn.

The first is House joint resolution 268, introduced by Mr. AYRES, of Kansas. I am not going to read the entire joint resolution, but will content myself by reading four or five lines from it, as follows:

> That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash at reasonable prices wheat, flour, corn, meal, oats, rye, barley, rice, beans, and potatoes, and products of same.

Mr. President, I suppose that after Congress passes that measure, if we should do so, it will be said that we have not given additional powers to the President of the United States. We will have simply put him in the business of buying and selling the products of the farms—that is all—and I am opposed to it. But it will be said that is necessary for the national defense and the security of our country, and that we should do it. I do not like that kind of legislation. It is not the kind of legislation that we have had in the past. It is not in consonance with the fundamental ideas of our governmental system.

I have been much disturbed, Mr. President—I have made no talk about it because it is not very important what my opinion may be on the subject—when I have read that we are going to force upon the countries of Europe democracy, or the principles of democracy, which means, if it means anything, the system of government that we have in the United States; that we are going to overthrow autocracy in Germany and in other nations that are at war with our allies and ourselves. My concern has been that while we are trying to do that, if we accomplish it, we are in danger of fastening upon our own country a system of autocracy such as the world has never known before. It may be said that it is only for the war. That may be for 1 year or for 10 years, God only knows; but I do not believe that we ought to abandon those principles for which our forefathers fought, and for which the Government fought during the Civil War, and for which we have stood in all history in matters of legislation.

I turn to another bill—and I am only going to talk for two or three minutes, Mr. President—Senate bill 4152. I want to read the first provision of it. It is a bill introduced by no less a personage than my good friend the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I presume that he introduced it on his own responsibility. I do not know whether that is so or not, because it is a very difficult matter for us to know exactly where to place responsibility in reference to bills that come before us for consideration at the present time. This bill provides:

> That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized, either directly or through such executive department or agency as he may designate, to take over for and on behalf of the United States from time to time during the present war the possession and use or ownership of any and all personal property and such use of, or such right, title, and interest in and to, any and all real property, or any part or portion thereof, as in his opinion is necessary for the national security and defense or the conduct of the Government.

Mr. President, that is a sweeping and drastic bill. It proposes to pass over to the President of the United States the right to take over not only the real estate of the citizen at his sweet will, but the right to take over the personal property of every citizen of the Republic, if he sees fit to do so, upon the plea that it will aid him in the successful prosecution of the war. I suppose that means that in the case of the accumulations of the citizen, the bank account of the citizen, the money that he has accumulated through long years of hard labor and which he has put away for the protection of his family or perhaps for himself in his old age, the President of the United States can reach out his strong hand and take that property and use it as he sees fit, under the unsupported plea that it will aid him in prosecuting the war to a successful issue. It is a tremendous power, but yet I apprehend that if that bill shall pass—I hope it may not—Senators will say, as they are saying regarding the so-called Overman bill now under consideration, "Why, that is not giving the President any great power. It is not adding to his power to enable him to do that. He ought to be given absolute and unquestioned authority to do anything and everything, so far as the citizen is concerned, that he sees fit to do as Commander in Chief of the Armies and Navies of the United States, and as Chief Executive of this land."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield; certainly.

Mr. KING. I have not seen the bill to which the Senator is now referring.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will send it to the Senator.

Mr. KING. But I apprehend that it must be drawn upon the theory that the President of the United States is authorized to exercise, for and in behalf of the Government and as the agent of the Government, the power of eminent domain. The Senator knows that in every State of the Union public-utility corporations have the power to exercise the right of eminent domain, and they may condemn real estate, and they may condemn personal property. Obviously, during the progress of the war, we may have to condemn personal property at times, because we are now condemning real estate necessary in the prosecution of the war; and if this is merely giving to the President the power to exercise the right of eminent domain——

Mr. GALLINGER. To do it without condemnation.

Mr. KING. Or the right to condemn personal property necessary for the prosecution of the war, I do not think the Senator could complain because we give him legislative authority, if legislative authority is necessary, for that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the arguments that have been made by other Senators, I am not surprised that the Senator from Utah makes this argument to-day. It is in line with what we have heard on the bill that is about to pass—that no matter what power we give to the President of the United States, he will exercise it wisely, and, as the Senator now suggests, he will have a right to exercise it without our authority. I do not believe so. The Constitution provides that no property shall be taken from the citizen without due process of law, but now it is proposed to do that very thing without reference to the provision of the Constitution.

I say to the Senator from Utah, and I say to the Senate, that when we put into the hands of the President of the United States, if we ever shall, the power that is embraced in that bill, to take possession arbitrarily and ruthlessly of the real estate of the citizen and the personal property of the citizen without any process of law, we are putting in the hands of the President a power that, in my judgment, has rarely if ever been heard of in the history of the world. For that reason, as I said a moment ago, if we are to adjourn this session of Congress within any reasonable time, I hope these two bills, at least, will not be pressed for consideration, because if they are I feel sure that the length of time that has been consumed in the consideration of the bill upon which we are soon to vote will be but a small portion of the time that will be taken in discussing the two bills to which I have just called attention; and I might enlarge the list, because there are other bills of a similar character lying about my desk, and which we are told we should support because, forsooth, the President wants it done. That is the crux of the argument, and I reject it as absolutely unsound and dangerous.

Mr. President, in the legislation of this session, and also of the last session, we have very largely taken from the legislative department of the Government the powers granted to that department by the Constitution of the United States, and passed them over to the executive department. I can not, by any possible course of reasoning, reach any other conclusion than that. It may some time become necessary to change our form of government, but it does not exist to-day. No one can state what the emergency in this country will be in the future, and we may be driven to do unconstitutional things to save the Government. As we scanned the newspapers this morning, and read the declaration of Lloyd-George, every one of us was forced to the conclusion that there is a great peril facing the United States at the present moment, and that we undoubtedly will have to resort to extraordinary means to support our armies and our navies before this war comes to a conclusion. I am willing to go to any reasonable extent along that line, but I do not believe this bill is calculated to accomplish that. I have voted for every so-called war measure that has been presented to Congress. I left my sick bed to come here to vote for the declaration of war, and I want to aid the President in every reasonable, proper, and constitutional way in the conduct of the war; but I am not willing to abrogate all the powers, the functions, the rights, and the duties that the Constitution imposes upon the legislative branch of this Government, and pass them over to any other department of the Government or any individual, however high his position may be. I may be wrong in some conclusions that I have reached regarding that matter, but nevertheless I have been persuaded—and I have been unable to disabuse my mind of the feeling—that we have gone about as far as we ought to go; indeed, that we have gone further than we ought to go until a greater emergency confronts the country than confronts it at the present time.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say. I do not want to obstruct the President in the performance of the great duties that are imposed upon him. I fully understand what his responsibilities are and what his troubles are. I knew Abraham Lincoln, and I know how he felt at certain critical times during the Civil War, because I myself saw the tears course down his cheek in a great emergency; and I have no disposition whatever to embarrass our present Chief Executive in the prosecution of the war in any reasonable and proper way. But I say again, Mr. President, that I think we ought to be very careful, we ought to take counsel with ourselves, laying aside, what we have laid aside, all partisanship in this matter, and ask ourselves the serious question whether we are not endangering the prerogatives and the rights of the legislative branch of the Government in putting such enormous powers into the hands of the Chief Executive.

I have no disposition to delay a vote upon this bill. Indeed, if I had had my way, it would have been voted upon before now. How I shall vote upon it is a matter of conscience with me, for which I shall be responsible to my own people and to the country; and I hope that every Senator will conscientiously and honestly cast his vote in the interest, as he sees it, of the great fundamental principles of our Government, and the perpetuity of our institutions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, when upon a former occasion I expressed the belief that the authority sought to be granted to the President in this measure was beyond our constitutional power, I did not enter into the discussion of the subject at any length, first, because my mind was chiefly concerned with another phase of the matter; and, second, because I was perfectly aware, as I am now, that in the juncture in which we find ourselves every Senator will discover constitutional ground upon which to plant himself for the performance of any act which he thinks ought to be performed. I am not willing, however, that the debate shall close without putting on record a restatement of my views concerning our constitutional authority to pass the bill. I am moved to do it because the entire discussion since that time has misapprehended and misconstrued wholly the position I attempted to take.

This measure is not an abdication of legislative power in any proper sense of that word. It is an abdication of legislative responsibility, however, in the complete and perfect sense of the word. It is an attempt to delegate to the President legislative power, and I reach that conclusion—and I shall be very brief about it—in this way:

The act of transferring powers and functions from one office, whether created by the Constitution or by statute law, to another office, likewise created by the Constitution or by statute law, is a legislative act. There can be no reasonable controversy with regard to that proposal. Otherwise we would have no power, we would have no authority ever to accomplish a purpose of that kind, and that we have the power is manifest by simple reference to its constant use by legislative bodies.

Whenever the transfer of the powers and functions shall occur, therefore, under this bill from one office to another or from one officer to another, the transfer must be accomplished by the legislative will. If this bill proposed that the functions or powers of one officer, say the Secretary of War, should be transferred to another officer, say, the Secretary of the Navy, but that the law should not go into effect until the President determined the existence of some event or some fact upon which the transfer should take place, it would be a legislative transfer and not an executive transfer, and the law would be wholly constitutional.

If, however, the bill admits the construction that it places in the discretion of the Executive the authority to make a transfer of all the powers of the Government in and amongst its offices and officers, then the transfer when it takes place is not a legislative one, it is not in accord with the legislative will, it is not dictated by the legislative judgment, and it becomes an executive act, and in my judgment is not warranted by the Constitution.

I am not prepared to admit that we could pass a law which would declare that whenever, in the judgment of the President, it is for the public welfare that the functions and powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission should pass to the Federal Reserve Board. But even it should be so admitted this is not such an act. The transfer that we authorize here is not to go into effect upon the happening of an event found by the President to exist or to have occurred, not upon the occurrence of any fact which he is to discover, adjudge, and promulgate.

In a very brief way that is the reason which led me to the conclusion that we were exceeding our constitutional authority, and every word which has ever been written by the Supreme Court upon this subject as far as we have gone along that line simply confirms my conviction that this particular measure is not in harmony with the Constitution.

I have said so much because I wanted my view to be understood, and if it ever becomes material in the future I wanted my attitude toward the subject to be incapable of misunderstanding. One is compelled, if he feels a doubt about his conclusion in regard to the matter, to state it, in view of all the differences of opinion which exists among men who are learned in the law. I did not say originally nor do I say now that my doubt with regard to our constitutional authority would be the paramount influence with me in the vote that I shall pass upon the measure. I am especially opposed to certain parts of the bill not so much because I think we are without authority to enact it but because I think we are inflicting a blow upon free institutions and lifting up an obstacle in the way of the successful prosecution of the war and the unification of the people that we can not easily remove.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Baird	Gulon	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hale	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Harding	New	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the substance of the amendment be read; I do not ask that it be read into every section of the bill, but just to get the language of the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, page 1, after the word "agencies," insert the words "having to do directly with war production or the conduct of the war." The same words are inserted in two other places.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply want to read into the RECORD in connection with that the language of the amendment proposed by the committee:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

I must say that I can not myself see any substantial difference in the two. The President is the judge in both cases, and I think the limitation is the same in one as in the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HARDING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). Upon the amendments to the bill I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. SMOOT's name was called). As I announced on a former occasion, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is absent from the city on account of illness in his family.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. Repeating the transfer of my pair that obtained on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT (after having voted in the affirmative). I have just been informed that the pair of some Senator has been transferred to me, and therefore I shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. SWANSON (after having voted in the negative). I understand that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] transferred his pair to me. I was detained from the Senate on official business. I withdraw my vote, so that the transfer may stand.

Mr. SMOOT (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that my transfer has been arranged in some other way, and therefore I will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Brandegee	Hale	New	Sterling

So Mr. HARDING'S amendments were rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the powers functions, or duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission as defined in the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto, and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities, approved March 1, 1913, and as defined in the act entitled 'An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes,' approved March 21, 1918."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I want Senators to observe that this is not a mere paraphrase of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and which was disposed of on Saturday. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, and I was entirely in favor of that amendment—I think it ought to have been adopted—exempted entirely the Interstate Commerce Commission from the operation of the act. I am sorry it was not done, but I accept the judgment of the Senate with regard to that question. The amendment which I have offered exempts two powers or two functions alone now conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by law.

The commission is charged by law with very many duties and enjoys large powers under the statutes. I bow to the will of the Senate, although I do not concur in its wisdom, that these functions and these powers, generally considered, may be transferred by the President to any office or officer he may select. They are exceedingly important as well as very numerous. My amendment, however, seeks to segregate just two things among all the powers which have been conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission and to relieve them from the operation of this measure. They are first the duty and function of valuing the railroad property of the United States. This duty and function were conferred by an act of Congress passed in 1913. They were conferred or charged upon the Interstate Commerce Commission because Congress believed that the body which had administered the regulatory law of the United States was the best possible tribunal for the ascertainment of the facts relating to the value of railroad property. I ask that the commission may be permitted, uninterfered with by this law or by any act of the President under it, to continue the work of valuation upon which it has entered and which it has carried forward to a point so closely approaching completion.

I need not say more, for I have already indicated how vital I think this work is and how much concerned the people of the United States are in the proper, fair ascertainment of the value of railroad property.

I ask also that the power and function and duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission as created by an act which Congress passed one month ago shall be retained by the commission. I ask that what it is authorized to do under what is known as the railroad act approved by the President on the 21st day of March, 1918, may remain untouched by the provisions of the present bill. You all remember what those powers are. There was never a debate in Congress more interesting than the one which led to the adoption of the railroad bill and the retention of certain powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We were then dealing with this precise subject. We were determining what the Interstate Commerce Commission should do, what power it should have over the operation of the great property passing into the hands of the President. By an overwhelming vote of both the Senate and the House the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission of reviewing rates that might be initiated by the Director General upon the complaint of anyone interested in the subject was retained, or confirmed, as you may see fit to call it, in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The distinguished chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate led the fight for the retention of this power upon the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He was ably and effectively supplemented in his campaign for this measure of protection to the people of the country by the most eminent Members of the majority of the Senate. There was almost unanimous concurrence in the opinion expressed through the votes of the Members of this body and of the House just about one month ago, that the welfare of the people of this country require that the power which had theretofore been granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for reviewing and passing, after a full and adequate investigation, upon the rates which might be established from time to time by the Director General should be retained. Nobody wants to take away from the Director General the right to initiate rates. I think he would have had that right even if we had been silent in the railroad act with regard to it, and he ought to have it, but equally let the Interstate Commerce Commission be continued in its power under proper circumstances to review the rates which may thus from time to time come into existence.

I ask Senators in all seriousness has anything happened in the last month which leads them to distrust the judgment they then entered or to modify the opinion which they then expressed? We all know that nothing has happened. The conditions are precisely the same. What was for the interest of the people of this country then is for the interest of the country now, and I am appealing to the Members of the Senate with all the earnestness of which I am capable to reflect a moment before they overturn the fabric which has been erected with infinite pains through years of effort upon the part of Congress, with the approval of all the people, and substitute some other system in its stead.

I have no reproaches in my heart and there shall be none upon my lips. I have no disposition to enter into the history of the war and its delinquencies. If there have been delinquencies they are not to be laid at the door of Congress, nor do I insist that, in the main, they could have been avoided by any human foresight.

Because there have been difficulties in our preparations for war, because there have been obstacles in the way which we have found it impossible to surmount, I hope that Congress will not, in an impulse of fidelity to the administration, clothe the President with a power which he can not use in the conduct of the war, although there is a sense in which the Interstate Commerce Commission and all that it does and all that it controls is related to the war, just as the energy of every human being in America, no matter in what channel it may be employed, is in some way related to the mighty controversy which is now engaging the attention and the strength and the power not only of the United States but of every other considerable nation in the world.

I hope that Senators will not regard the question I have proposed in this amendment as foreclosed by the vote which defeated the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]; I hope they will review the subject calmly and reflectively and retain for the welfare of the people, and thereby for the successful prosecution of the gigantic undertaking which we have assumed, the jurisdiction and the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission in these two respects at least.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the two points to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has called the attention of the Senate were, of course, reviewed when we had the railroad bill under discussion. I want to say in reference to the first—the physical valuation of the railroads—that the information gathered by that commission with reference to the real valuation of the roads would have been of considerable importance to the committee. I made inquiry of the member of the commission who had charge of the physical valuation of the railroads, and although three or four years had been consumed in the investigation, something like $11,000,000 had been expended, he informed me, and through me the committee, that there was not information of any importance to give us; and, as has been suggested, that at a time when we were attempting to pass an act here dealing justly with the owners of that property in its relation to the public whom they serve. The committee did not get one word of any value whatever in relation to that valuation.

I desire to say in this connection that a study of the provisions of the physical-valuation law will convince any practical business man as to its utter impracticability if not its impossibility of executon. The physical value of the roads necessarily changes from time to time; no one will pretend to say that the physical value of a piece of property to-day must necessarily be the same as of the date of the inception of a long investigation and ascertainment of its value.

So I consider as to that feature of the proposed amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Iowa that a good purpose would be served if we should either give somebody the power to suspend the law or should suspend it ourselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume the person to whom the Senator from South Carolina is referring is Judge Prouty. Judge Prouty is not a member of the commission at all, but is chairman of the committee or bureau on valuation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And is it not true that he said that the inventory which had been in the course of being made in the last four years was complete with regard to a great many railroads and was incomplete, although partially advanced, with regard to a great many others, that the elements of value had not been passed upon by the commission in any case; but that in one year the inventory could be completed and in one more year the commission could pass upon the entire matter?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, there was quite a good deal of explanation, as will always be found in connection with requests for great appropriations by Congress, but we got no information as to the roads that had been valued which was of any use to us in determining the compensation which we ought to give the roads. I am fully convinced of the truth of my statement, and I think the Senator from Iowa perhaps does not attach such great importance to that work as would be attached to the second proposition.

Mr. President, I took the position in the committee and on the floor of the Senate that the rate-making power of the Interstate Commerce Commission should remain with that body. I then gave my reasons for that contention, and I shall not now repeat them. I am as heartily in favor of that now as I was then.

The difference between the legislation that was proposed at that time and this legislation is this: There we specifically proposed to remove from the Interstate Commerce Commission the rate-making power and during the operation of Federal control of railroads to give it to the Director General of the Railroads. Here we simply provide that if the exigency of this war emergency calls for a transfer of the functions of one department to another for the proper prosecution of the war, the President shall have the power to do that. I take it that after the Senate and the other House have so overwhelmingly expressed their will as to the rate-making power, the President of the United States will not seek, and is not seeking, by indirection to do that which he found he could not do by direction; and if the emergency arises by which the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission must be discharged by some other agency, the rate-making power will not be assumed by it.

I will go one step further, Mr. President. I want to make myself plain. Never before in the history of the world has such a conflict appalled the nations of the earth; never before since the foundation of this Government has the menace of its disruption loomed so large as now. In the awful armed struggle the conditions and circumstances have so radically changed that veterans of other wars are on the same footing with the novices that go to the front. Each day brings new experiences. This war is being fought largely in the scientific laboratories of the different countries. We are face to face with the issue, which is growing larger and more menacing, as to whether or not America with her Government shall exist. Not only that, but we are threatened with the danger of having our very Government disrupted and being placed under the domination and control of those who in this war have evidenced the fact that all common feelings of humanity as expressed in our civilization are disregarded. The very sanctity of our firesides, the virtue and chastity of our women, are in the balance. Our enemies have a disregard for all that we, even in moments of passion and under the impulse of war, will grant to our enemies. That is denied to those whom this horde of rapine and lust have overrun. The means they have with which to accomplish their hellish purposes seem to have availed in part.

Under these circumstances I am willing, for one, if it becomes necessary to do so, to place the entire power and resources of this country in the hands of one man in order to save that which is dearer to you and to me than are the wealth and property of this country as expressed in rate-making or commerce or otherwise. I am willing to lay all upon the altar of our country and to give one man supreme power, a godspeed, and the upholding and the encouragement that you and I can give him. I will give it all if we can save that which has made this country so dear to us if the President asks it in the supreme hour of our peril. He must recognize the responsibility for which he is asking. He has become the spokesman, the head and front, of that organized, solidified force that is to meet in the shock of battle and compel a decision as to whether or not America, with her civilization and her laws, shall exist or shall cease to exist. He has asked it, and I, for one, shall vote to give it to him. If he says it will take the civil, the military, and the naval forces combined to accomplish our just purpose, if he wants to assume the responsibility now, I am willing to give to him the trial. I do not know. In this cataclysm all the old landmarks have been wiped out; the very nature of warfare has been changed and is changing from day to day. The air and the depths of the ocean have become battle fields; and you and I do not know with what to meet the attack. What was essential and efficient in all the wars preceding this seems to have been discarded, and brave men are feeling their way along to find proper and efficient weapons with which to meet the kaleidoscopic changes in this murder across the sea.

I do not know, God knows I wish I did know, what is right in this emergency, in this hour of darkness; but not knowing, I will not hold on to the little precedents which have granted me the enjoyment of certain rights and privileges, if by withholding them I shall be in doubt as to whether or not I have subtracted somewhat from the power that is necessary in order to meet the power which is concentrated abroad. There is no Senator on this floor who has greater regard for State rights than have I, who will hurry with a gladder heart or with swifter feet to reestablish them when the glad day shall come that this menace is removed; but I will not stand pleading for State rights now.

Until that hour has come, I believe in trusting the loyalty and patriotism of those who are charged with responsibility in the prosecution of this war. If I did not believe in them, I would ask and I would join with others in asking their removal from office. You and I can not afford to take chances now. If these men do not measure up to the supreme task, we shall have to have others. America is dearer to me and to you than is the mere partisanship of Democracy or Republicanism. Over and above it all and in it all are America and her institutions. If these men can not preserve them, we have men who can. Every American citizen has the same object in view. To the men whom we have charged with responsibility for the prosecution of this war I am willing, upon their initiative, upon their suggestion, to say, "I do not know; you have asked it, and here it is." If in the execution of that policy it proves to be a failure and there is a lack of judgment and efficiency on their part, then we must have others.

America is to be saved, and I will not stand and quibble over whether or not there is precedent on the statute books for a law we are called upon to enact. The question is what is necessary in the judgment of those charged with responsibility to win this war. The situation grows darker every day; there is not a man here whose heart is not chilled at the revelations that come day by day from the other side. It is time for us, not in a spirit of criticism but in a spirit of Americanism, to seek to save the Nation, and then as partisans of different political faiths to fight out our differences when the skies are clear and there is on the horizon no cloud of rapine and lust that threatens our peace and happiness and the perpetuity of our splendid form of government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if I knew a man in the United States who I thought had superhuman qualities, if I thought the President had such qualities, if I thought there was anyone anywhere who, if given all power, would show all wisdom, I would willingly make him dictater and give him all power to whip the Germans, but, unfortunately, there is no man of that class.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] says that he wishes to put power in the hands of those charged with responsibility. He is giving up by this bill the authority of those charged with responsibility, for the Constitution provides that not only shall the Congress declare war and provide money to conduct it, but also it shall make rules for the regulation and government of the armies and navies. Congress is charged by the Constitution with a full share of responsibility, and we are not simply transferring power to those charged with responsibility; we abandon our own responsibility.

I have at all times been willing to vote for the portion of the bill which gave the President the right to redistribute the functions of the Army and the Navy, of the Shipping Board, and of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I have been opposed to authorizing him to transfer the functions of the civil establishment. I am opposed to that because I am sure it will not help win the war and because there is nothing in the civil establishment that ought to be changed merely during the war. I grant that there are features of the civil establishment that might be wisely changed, if carefully studied and changed permanently, not simply during the war.

I am sure the Interstate Commerce Commission ought not to be interfered with, and I am sure that the Federal Reserve Board ought not to be interfered with. I hope the President will not interfere with them; I hope no President will interfere with them. I know if he does he strikes my country a blow that may shatter her finances, her banking, and her industries during the war.

I can not accept the mere statement that it is desired to make these changes to help win the war when I look further and see that the changes might weaken the country industrially and hinder the country in winning the war. I do not recognize the President as the wisest banker or the wisest business man in the land. I do not see any reason why the control of these branches of the civil government as regulated by the Congress should be transferred to any President.

Mr. President, I have prepared an amendment in the nature of a substitute for this bill, which gives all the power asked so far as the Army and Navy, the Shipping Board, and the Emergency Fleet Corporation are concerned. I do not desire to detain the Senate to present it formally and have it voted upon, for votes taken show it will not be adopted, but I ask leave to have it printed in connection with my remarks. I do not intend to offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

SECTION 1. That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces the President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions in and among the War and Navy Departments, the United States Shipping Board, and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon such departments, board, corporation, or bureau, and upon bureaus, offices or officers of the same, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary: Provided, That such regulations and orders shall be in writing and given due publicity: Provided further, That this act shall remain in force during the continuance of the present war and for one year after the termination of the war by the proclamation of the treaty of peace, or at such earlier time during the said year as the President may designate: Provided further, That the termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued pursuant to this act and during the time that this act is in force.

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized in and among the War and Navy Departments, the United States Shipping Board, and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any bureaus, offices, or officers, to transfer any duties or powers from one existing bureau, office, or officer to another, and to transfer the personnel thereof, or any part of it, either by detail or assignment.

SEC. 3. That the President is further authorized to establish an executive agency which may exercise such jurisdiction and control over the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment as in his judgment may be advantageous; and, further, to transfer to such agency, for its use, all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act any moneys heretofore and hereafter appropriated for the use of any such department, bureau, office, or officer shall be expended only for the purposes for which it was appropriated under the direction of such other agency as may be directed by the President hereunder to perform and execute said function.

SEC. 5. That upon the termination of this act all executive or administrative agencies, departments, commissions, bureaus, offices, or officers shall exercise the same functions, duties, and powers as heretofore or as hereafter by law may be provided, any authorization of the President under this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 6. That all laws or parts of laws conflicting with the provisions of this act are to the extent of such conflict suspended while this act is in force.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, with reference to the transfer of functions in the Army and Navy, the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, I wish to say that I do not believe that that power is of any great value, yet I am perfectly willing to have it granted. The thing of real value has been done since this bill has been under consideration so far as the Shipping Board is concerned, for we have had at last placed there a man of powerful mind and organizing capacity. What we have lacked there has not been the power to transfer functions; it has been the failure to transfer men. What was needed was not the moving around of authority but the placing in control of one man—not simply an admiralty lawyer or a few lawyers who knew nothing about shipbuilding—a real manufacturer or a real construction genius to build ships. Thank God, I believe that there is such a man now in charge of that work.

Take the building of our fighting aircraft. The trouble has not been because of a failure to transfer functions; the President has had that power; it has been because of the lack of a man to attend to the work. The trouble in the War Department now is not the lack of power by the President to transfer functions; it is a change of men we need; it is the placing of men in position with power who really mean to fight the war. I will not name any of them who might resign and have substitutes put in their places, but that would be vastly more important to the country and vastly more important in connection with our whipping the Germans than this bill allowing a transfer of functions. It is not the transfer of functions that is so much needed; it is the placing of men with mind and strength and iron in places of responsibility, who will change the management and put force and drive and strength into every part of the War Department. That is what is needed to whip the Germans.

Still I am willing for functions to be changed around. They say there is red tape in the way. Why, Mr. President, there is not a man who knows anything about the organization of the departments in Washington who does not know that there is no red tape in the departments except that which the lack of executive ability on the part of Cabinet members has permitted to stay. It does not take an act of Congress to get rid of the red tape. That plea in behalf of this bill is persuasive only to the uninformed.

We have not been told of a function that is to be changed anywhere. Do you know why? Because there is not one of sufficient importance to be worthy of mention. That is why. I do not object very much to any portion of this bill except as it has reference to the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not think it will amount to much in its effect upon the civil departments. I do object to it very much as to those two agencies.

I have been trying to get a little comfort about the Interstate Commerce Commission, and wondering if it will not be a pretty difficult thing to transfer their functions to some other bureau, and, if they are transferred, if the repository of those functions will not be compelled to hold a trial and give a hearing to unjustly treated shippers and communities. I do not know; I have been thinking about it since last Saturday, just trying to find some way to save the industries of the country from the wreck that might otherwise be caused by this bill. If the transfer of the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission requires what I suggest, nowhere else can an agency be found to perform the functions, and they must be left where they are.

I have said that under no circumstances would I vote for this bill. I think the best thing about it is the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], which definitely gives power and authority with reference to the man to be put in charge of building flying machines. There is something tangible in that. If the President wants the authority to change the functions of the War and Navy Departments, I am perfectly willing for him to have it; but I can not tell anything he wants to change, and I do not think there is much that can be accomplished. I have about come to the conclusion that the true reason we have not been told anything is because there is nothing to tell. There might something come up; and I think the President ought to have a free hand about the War and Navy Departments, and if anything should come in connection with which he wanted to take action I would be in favor of his taking it. If I am mistaken and he has something in mind, I still wish to give him a free hand; if there is anything he can do, I want him to do it; and if there is anything others can do to help win this fight I want them to do it. No man lives who is more impressed with the serious feature of the war or who is more willing to make sacrifices to whip the Germans than I. I have reached the conclusion that we must not only win in France but that before we get through we must finish the fight for good, and reach a place in the fight where we will not be troubled with the Germans any more.

I am willing to carry the fight that far. I think it is a fight to the finish. I think it is useless to talk or think about anything but fighting the Germans when you think of the Germans. I would have our own country realize the seriousness of the fight, the folly, the lack of vision of our country in not getting ready for it before we declared the state of war to exist; and now I am in favor of the immediate preparation of men and ordnance for 5,000,000 men, at least. I agree with ex-President Taft; I think it is folly for us blindly to see this fighting going on in France, not realizing that we may have to fight by ourselves; and if we have any vision we will prepare the guns and the munitions and the men to fight by ourselves, if necessary. God grant it will not be necessary; but if there is one chance in ten that it may be necessary, there is no excuse for not getting ready to do it.

I trust the Ordnance Department will proceed upon the theory that we must have the guns and have the cannon and have the powder to arm and keep at the front 5,000,000, and I trust we will take steps in the near future to prepare the officers for that number and be ready to put them into action. Anything less is lack of vision.

Mr. President, I have not fully made up my mind, all the amendments being beaten, whether to vote at all, or to vote against this bill, or to vote for it. I do not think there is a great deal in it. There are just two things to cause serious harm in it. I refer to the Federal reserve and the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the President really sees anything in the transfer of functions that can do any good, I wish he had told us about it. I do not see it. I am willing for him to have it. But whatever happens, I believe the Senate, without regard to any partisan spirit, without regard to politics, is ready to back the President and stand to the last man for everything that will help conduct the war with force and power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think it should hardly be necessary at this time for a Senator to state his position in regard to the war and its vigorous prosecution; but some intimations have been made by the Senator in charge of the bill, and I do not know but by one or two other Senators as well, to the effect that the matter of politics was involved in the opposition to the bill.

I simply want to say, Mr. President, that I have hardly been able to think in terms of party in the discussion of any of these war measures. I am for the prosecution of this war on our part with all America's might, mind, soul, and strength until it ends in a victory for the allied arms; until every German soldier, whether he be in France, Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, or the Ukraine, is back within the original boundaries of the German Empire, and the allies, free from the scourge of the Hun, can dictate the terms of a just and lasting peace. To this end, Mr. President, I have supported every war measure from the declaration of war down to the present hour; and I have not paused either to measure closely or to dole out the powers we conferred upon the President in the several bills in which we have granted him such large powers, as, for example, the food-control bill, the espionage act, and the trading-with-the-enemy act, nor have I paused to scrutinize them closely from the standpoint of our authority under the Constitution to confer such powers. It was my desire that the President have all the power necessary to accomplish the purposes of the acts which I believed to be steps reasonably necessary in the winning of the war. But these acts which we have already passed related to particular subjects. The powers granted were certain and specific. The Congress and the country knew what could be done and what to expect. These grants of power are not analogous to the grant asked for in the pending bill; they form no precedent for it; neither do the acts cited in the brief of the Senator from North Carolina. Indeed, since in all these cases they were specific grants for specific purposes, they constitute an argument against the blanket power here sought for rather than an argument in favor of it.

And I here venture the assertion that powers such as are here contemplated were never asked or granted or dreamed of before. Have we yet fully realized what they are? Inquiry has failed to reveal the purpose for which they are wanted. One of the excuses for granting them is that they will never be exercised, at least, to anything like their full extent. Much of the discussion has been discursive, and naturally so, inevitably so, because of lack of any knowledge, definite or indefinite, as to the consolidations or reorganizations or reforms of any kind which were to be effected on the passage of the bill. Senators have regarded the exemption from the operation of the bill of the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission as highly important. I agree with them. The bill is heralded as a war measure. It is for the period of the war and a limited time thereafter. In the usual phraseology, it is for the national security and defense. Why should not only these two but the Civil Service Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and every other permanent and independent commission whose primary functions and powers are in no way connected with the prosecution of the war be exempt? What redistribution of their powers and functions can be made that will aid in the prosecution of the war? Name one.

But the discussion in regard to these commissions, important as they are, is, after all, so much camouflage of the main issue, which is, Shall the President be given the power, without one scintilla of evidence as to the necessity for such power, without the citation of one concrete instance in which it is thought desirable to exercise the power, to redistribute all the functions and powers of the several executive departments of government? For this is what this bill, in very terms, proposes to do. Has that been fully comprehended? Has the full meaning, significance, and sweep of it been grasped?

There is no legislation with which to compare it, for the simple reason that no legislation ever enacted by Congress has been revolutionary. This is. Four great departments of government were created in 1789 by Congress, the only power that could create them—the Departments of State, of the Treasury, of War, of Justice. The others have been added since. Their powers and functions were conferred and prescribed by the several acts of creation; and thus Congress distributed their powers and functions. Subsequent acts of Congress have, as need has arisen, added other powers and functions. They are all appropriate, all necessary. Whether in peace or in war, they are to be and can effectually be administered only by the departments to which they were originally severally distributed. Having been in the exercise of these powers and functions for now considerably more than a century, these departments have the adequate and necessary rules, regulations, equipment, and machinery for the transaction of all the business pertaining thereto or over which they have control. Congress could not itself make a redistribution of these powers and functions without creating havoc indescribable. Nothing would so cripple our energies or paralyze our war efforts or our war program as to undertake now a redistribution of the powers and functions of the executive departments.

What would the Department of Commerce do with the powers and functions of the Department of War if it had them, or vice versa; or the Department of Agriculture with the powers and functions of the Department of the Navy if it had them, or vice versa? I can imagine the consternation with with which the farmer, who has been benefited in a thousand ways by the interest and activities of the Department of Agriculture, will view the grant of a power which in its exercise could transfer the powers and functions of a great department on which he has come to rely to some other department—one which neither under the law nor through experience nor tradition has the remotest connection with his agricultural needs or ideals. He would think, if he did not exclaim—

> Oh Judgment, thou art fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason.

If not something worse; and, level-headed as he usually is, he would, in answer to the claim that this was for the purpose of winning the war, be apt to say: "One good way to win the war is not to get stampeded to begin with."

It is time we learned the naked truth, that power to redistribute all the functions and powers of the executive departments of the Government is not, and never can be, necessary to the winning of the war. When the people understand the situation, and that this bill is not a bill simply to prevent duplication in the secret service, or in the health service, or in some other service, but that it carries with it the awful power to reorganize the Government by revolutionizing the great governmental departments that have stood the tests of time, of peace and of war as well, they will denounce a measure which as yet is imperfectly understood by them, if understood at all. This failure to understand is through no fault of theirs, but because of the meager reports that have gone out in regard to the scope of the bill and the persistent camouflage in which its proponents have indulged.

Will we not take a lesson from the warnings of statesmen and from students of our institutions? I quoted that fine admonition found in Washington's Farewell Address in my remarks a few days ago. I shall not repeat at length, but here is one sentence:

The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power by dividing and distributing it into different depositories and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them.

One further excerpt:

But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transcient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Point out, if you can, one benefit—even transient benefit—which will result from a power to redistribute all the functions and powers of the executive departments of the Government.

Mr. President, in seeking to justify this bill its advocates justify a dictatorship, some of them openly and avowedly so. This is not the fifth century before the Christian era. This is not Rome, with her turbulent population of patricians on one side plebeians on the other, with a mighty foe at her gates. There is no need for a Cincinnatus here. But if subsequent Congresses prove facile to the principle of this bill, the time may come when the factions temporarily united and the enemy beaten back Cincinnatus, conscious of his power will not return to his plow.

There never was greater truth than that expressed by Judge Simeon E. Baldwin, former governor of the State of Connecticut, and I am not sure but that he was chief justice at one time of the supreme court of that State. He says:

The form of every government and the powers which it may exercise must rest either on the will of the governing authority or the consent of those who are its subjects. Political absolutism may be built up on either of these foundations. It exists whenever those who are governed are for the time under the dominion of a power which they can not control and which knows no limits but those of personal discretion.

Under this bill, in regard to every one of the 10 great executive departments of this Government, in the transfer of functions and powers of each, there is no limit except the discretion of the President of the United States.

Here again I desire to quote from another article from a book entitled "The old law and the new order," by Mr. G. W. Alger. He says:

Among the forgotten books of political philosophy there is one which, perhaps more than any other, should be remembered in America, because it is the philosophy which stood at the beginning of the American Revolution; a philosophy the attempt to apply which was one of the great causes of that Revolution. This book was Bolingbroke's "The Idea of a Patriot King." In that work, written at a time when parliamentary government was at its lowest ebb, and English politics a sink of corruption, when rotten boroughs flourished and the votes of unrepresentative representatives had to be bought on every important measure, Bolingbroke advocated the control of Parliament and of the legislative affairs both of England and her colonies by the strong hand of a pariot king. Bolingbroke believed that the vigorous use of the royal prerogative by a patriot king ruling with wisdom, and controlling by a strong hand Parliament and the affairs of the nation, would afford a practical solution for the evils created by a corrupt, inefficient, unrepresentative, and factional Parliament. America did not accept this doctrine then. The idea of a pariot king collapsed under George III. His attempt to put this philosophy into effect was among the causes of the Revolution which separated us from Great Britain.

One of the great contributions of America to British freedom came through our refusal to accept this new political doctrine. The patriot-king theory disappeared in England after the Revolution. A cure for the conditions which the pariot king and his prerogative proposed to cure was found in a reformed Parliament and a better system of representation.

Mr. President, we have no rotten boroughs in the United States. Never in the history of Congress have we had more than a very few, if any, unrepresentative representatives; the general high character of the Members of both Houses is beyond dispute; and hence there is no need under our system and practice of a patriot king. Americans now would repudiate the idea of a patriot king as emphatically as their forefathers did in 1776. A few years ago there was a distinguished Senator from Georgia a Member of this body. I think probably most of the Members here now had the privilege of knowing him while he was yet a Member. He was an able and distinguished Senator, a prominent member, if not chairman—I am not sure about that—of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. He was one of the ablest lawyers and one of the finest reasoners in the Senate, Hon. Augustus O. Bacon. He had something to say in 1906 on the President and Congress in an article written for the Independent. The article was presented here by Senator Hale, of Maine, and was made a Senate document.

I want to read just the two short concluding paragraphs of his article. He says:

These limitations thus set by the Constitution on the powers of the President are not quoted here in depreciation of the executive office. As already said, it is as designed by the Constitution a great and a noble office—the greatest and the noblest of all the earth.

And as an American citizen I heartily believe in that statement and have pride in the fact that our Chief Executive holds such an exalted place.

But it is an executive office, and to no one who has filled or who shall hereafter fill it is given any constitutional warrant to exercise directly or indirectly the legislative function.

There can be no condition more dangerous to the maintenance of free government than is found in the concentration in the hands of one man at the same time of both the executive power and practically the power to make the laws he is to execute. Whatever may be the form of government, when these two powers are thus concentrated in the hands of one man, the government is an autocracy pure and simple.

Now, Senators, I ask you to note the last few lines of this paragraph and see how pertinent and significant they are. Says Mr. Bacon:

It makes no difference in practical effect whether that one man himself decrees the laws or whether they are enacted in obedience to his dictation.

So, Mr. President, how can we here, without, as I said, a scintilla of evidence to show the necessity for it, grant a power to the President to revolutionize the great departments of government and all the business of the Government? If they would point out a single instance in which it were necessary, I would, in my eagerness to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion, gladly support and vote for it; but that they have wholly failed to do. Must we reorganize the great departments of the Government in order to avoid duplication in the Secret Service or in some other subordinate branch of the service? Such has been the argument advanced by the chief proponent of this measure. It will avoid duplication in this or that branch of the service. But all this can be easily and speedily accomplished under power that already exists or by proper legislation to that end, if, indeed, there is duplication sufficient to make it worth while.

Mr. President, in view of my chief objection to the bill, I desire to suggest by way of an amendment the remedy. It will effect every purpose mentioned in this long debate and still enable us to preserve the semblance of free government—"a government of laws and not of men."

My amendment which I now propose is as follows:

In lines 2 and 3 on page 2 of the bill strike out the words "executive department," and then to carry out the meaning of the amendment and make the rest of the bill harmonize with it strike out the word "department" in line 25 on page 2 of the bill.

What will be the situation if the words "executive department" are stricken out in lines 2 and 3 and the word "department" stricken out in line 25?

This will be the situation: The President will not have the power under the bill, if you strike out the words "executive department" and the word "department," in line 25, to redistribute the powers and functions of the several executive departments, but he can go into a department, take therefrom a bureau or a division or an officer, if he desires, and transfer it or him to some other department or bureau if he is needed there, or he can consolidate or coordinate bureaus of different departments. That is the purpose and the object of this amendment. It will permit the President to take any commission or bureau or officer of one department, and if his services can be better utilized in some other department to transfer the bureau, commission, or officer to that other department; but the original primary function of the great departments of the Government as established in the laws of their creation will remain intact as they should be.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota if he is speaking to the amendment or talking on the bill?

Mr. STERLING. From the time I proposed the amendment I have been speaking on the amendment. My desire was to explain briefly the amendment. I have finished both what I had to say on the original bill and on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair finds it a little difficult to keep the record of time. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I have no desire to detain the Senate except for a few brief moments.

I have endeavored since this bill has been before the Senate to do all I could to confine it to the war-making agencies of the Government. I understand full well that the proponents of the bill contend that the language in the bill as they have reported it does so confine it, but that language is so general, it is so indefinite, that I am afraid it is not only capable of but liable to a stretched construction, and that as construed the powers will be made to cover not only the war-making departments and bureaus and agencies of the Government but every bureau and every agency and every department of the Government, even where it touches civic affairs only and exclusively.

Therefore I have been very much disappointed in some of the amendments that sought to accomplish that purpose which I believe have not been approved by the Senate. Still, in this crisis that confronts our country, I am more than anxious that the Executive shall have every power that possibly can be conferred on the President of the United States in his office as Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and I would hesitate not to confer such powers even if coupled with it there were certain other things that I thought were of doubtful wisdom.

So it is my purpose, with a great deal of doubt and with some reluctance, because the bill has not been limited in the way in which it should be, to vote for the bill. I take that course with less reluctance and with less doubt because in other matters that I regard as much more important, in other matters that affect directly the liberties and rights of the American citizens, we have not hesitated to confer powers far greater than these. As I said, I have not either the same amount of tender solicitude or of grave concern upon the proposition to grant very large powers over mere executive agencies of the Government and mere Government employees in comparison with granting such powers over American citizens in the ordinary civic concerns of the country.

For those reasons, Mr. President, because we are facing in my opinion a crisis which demands that every possible improvement shall be made in the use of our military and naval forces against the foe, I am going, after a great deal of doubt, to vote for this measure.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I suppose we are nearing a vote on this bill, and I will say that I intend to vote for the bill. I am particularly pleased with the amendment adopted one day last week, I understand, in my absence, by unanimous vote, which confers actual and needed executive power, by virtue of law—administrative authority—upon the Government Aviation Board, of which Mr. John D. Ryan, of Montana, is now the chief. I was compelled by official business to be absent from the Chamber several days last week while the bill was being considered, and I understand that, in connection with the discussion of the amendment to which I have referred, the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] paid a compliment to Mr. Ryan and predicted that his appointment would result in increased activity in aircraft production. Had I been here I would then have indorsed what the distinguished Senator from Colorado said, and I now take pleasure in indorsing it.

Mr. Ryan is a highly respected and distinguished citizen of Montana, who has been unusually successful in large business and industrial enterprises. He is a gentleman of a high degree of executive ability, and the people of his State are highly pleased with the appointment which he has received in connection with our prosecution of the war. Under his guidance I predict greatly increased activity in aircraft production and good results which I expect to result speedily to the benefit of the country in the prosecution of the war and the advancement of our cause. Mr. Ryan is a man of large affairs, wide experience, and much force of character, and the Government is fortunate to obtain his services in the most important field to which he has been called and in which he has consented to serve.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I dislike to let this bill come to a vote without briefly stating the reasons why I can not give it my support.

I was rather startled a few days ago when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] made the statement that our Government, which had been formed under the Constitution, had been so changed, so revolutionized that it has now become a bureaucratic Government, a Government controlled by the bureaus, and I was more surprised at what I understood to be his statement that because of that fact he intended to support this measure.

My mind went back to the address of the President of the United States on that historic evening of the 2d of April of last year, when assembled in the Hall of the House of Representatives he called the Nation to arms. In that message I find the President used this language:

> I shall take the liberty of suggesting, through the several executive departments of the Government, for the consideration of your committees, measures for the accomplishment of the several objects I have mentioned. I hope that it will be your pleasure to deal with them as having been framed after very careful thought by the branch of the Government upon which the responsibility of conducting the war and safeguarding the Nation will most directly fall.

Down to that time, during all the years in which our Government has had an existence, it has been the practice of the Chief Executive to avail himself not only of the right but the privilege which the Constitution gives him to inform Congress from time to time of the state of the Union and to recommend such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. Down to the incoming of the present administration that, I believe, has been universally the practice; but, after securing the declaration of war against Germany, eight long months ensued in which no message came from the President of the United States to the Congress regarding the necessity for or the character of the measures which were known throughout the country as administration measures. On turning to the Constitution I find that that clause to which I have referred reads:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress information.

But in the message of April 2, 1917, the President distinctly informed the Congress that hereafter he shall communicate with it through the departments, and they through the committees of Congress. The result was that all during that long first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, in which the great war legislation was framed and enacted, this body and the corresponding body at the other end of the Capitol were left without adequate knowledge of the conditions upon which the enactment of the legislation which had been suggested through the various departments of the Government over which the President presides had been requested.

In looking over the measures that were passed during that momentous summer and autumn following the declaration of war I find among other acts was the great bond act of April 24. There was also the authorization of the President to take over enemy vessels; the Army conscription act of May 18; the act of May 22, temporarily increasing the Army and the Navy; the act of June 12, amending the war-insurance act; the war-appropriation act of June 15, which carried an appropriation of over $3,000,000,000, and in which provision was made for creating the great fleet now in process of construction. We had also the espionage act of June 15; the aviation act of July 24; an act providing for priority in shipments of August 10; the food-survey act of August 10; the food-control act of August 10; the second bond-issue act of September 24; the act of October 1, creating an Aircraft Board and providing for its maintenance; the revenue act of October 3; and very many other great and important war measures, in the consideration of which and in the enactment of which Congress was left many times to act in the dark, but concerning which there was united action on both sides of this Chamber. I have examined the votes on those various measures. Many of them were passed viva voce; to hardly any of them was there a material opposition. During the war period it has been difficult to determine who in this body was a Democrat and who was a Republican, so far as his action has affected war legislation.

We have come down to this time without information from the President upon the state of the Union and without recommendations by the President of appropriate legislation; but all war legislation has been enacted upon the recommendation of the appropriate Senate committees who have been in communication with the several departments of the Government. The major portion of the information which the Senate as a body has secured has come through inquiries upon the floor of the Senate addressed to the chairmen of the committees having charge of the respective bills when under consideration.

But now when we are confronted with this measure we are outside the line of all previous legislation. When other bills were presented, hearings were had, I presume, before committees; the secretaries of the different departments appeared and in some instances brought with them experts. They presented facts and conditions, and information was obtained upon which the measures were reported favorably to the Senate. But this measure came directly from the White House; nobody denies that. It is brought to this body by a member of the Cabinet; it was delivered to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who introduced it, and it bears his name.

As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I sat with that body on 14 different occasions when this bill constituted the only matter under consideration. During all those 14 days I heard but one reason given as a justification for the passage of the act; that was that it was desirable to avoid the duplication of work in the different departments; but there we were met by the statute, which was proposed by the Senator from North Carolina in 1917, as an amendment to the appropriation bill, and which was passed, directing the Bureau of Efficiency to investigate all cases where there had been a duplication of work, and which gave the President free authority to correct that evil. When the committee came to consider this measure, as has been stated on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], it was moved, inasmuch as we had no information as to the necessity of this legislation, to invite the heads of the different departments to come before the committee and to inform us whether there was need for such legislation as this; and if so, what it was. But in every instance such motions were voted down in committee by a small majority.

So, as I have stated, we considered this matter at 14 different sessions of the committee. It has been considered by the Senate during the period of four weeks. I have watched the debate carefully, and I can not now recall an affirmative statement of a single action that the President wants to take under this bill; I do not recall a single condition which he wishes to remedy, other than the one I have mentioned; and yet this bill gives him a power broader by far than ever was asked by or dreamed of by any other President of the United States.

I had hoped, Mr. President, that this bill might be properly amended. I would go to the outside limit in conferring power upon the President in time of war. As was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to-day, I believe in the concentration of power when great things are to be accomplished; but, Mr. President, I can not forget that this Government was formed by wise men; I can not forget that it is "a government of the people, by the people, for the people"; and that we are the people's representatives. As a Senator of the United States I am bound by my oath of office to maintain the Constitution. The provisions of this bill, I believe, exceed all constitutional bounds. It belittles the legislative branch of the Government and is an attack upon the dignity of Congress. If adopted, it will be quoted in time to come as a surrender on the part of Congress of the powers which the people and the Constitution have vested in this body.

Mr. President, I have no criticism to offer upon anybody who takes a different view from that which I entertain. I look upon this measure as one which I can not, upon my conscience, support. Had it been amended as I think it might have been amended and still given the President the most unlimited powers in maintaining his strength and the strength of the Nation in this war, I would have voted for it gladly; but one amendment after another has been rejected, until we are compelled to believe that those voting against such amendments are reflecting the President's will. If that be true, the bill is one which its maker intends to have cover every activity of government and to give him a power the breadth of which can not be measured.

I would have quoted from the Farewell Address of Washington, where he warns us against usurpation of power by the Executive, had it not been quoted five minutes ago by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. It is a warning applicable to present conditions, and one which ought to be observed and carefully heeded at this time, when a great responsibility rests upon us as a body. For one, I am unable to support the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]; and

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. BECKHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness.

Mr. WEEKS. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and vote "yea."

So Mr. STERLING's amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer an amendment to which I think the Senator in charge of the bill will have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, on page 2, it is proposed to strike out the words "one year" and insert the words "six months"; and in line 13 to strike out the words "during the said year."

Mr. OVERMAN. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer an amendment, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "Provided," down to the words "Provided further," in line 14, and to insert the following:

That this act shall remain in force for one year or for such shorter period as the President may designate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I realize that the hour is late and that some Senators are tired. I shall therefore occupy but a very few moments of the time of the Senate explaining my amendment.

This whole bill is in the nature of an experiment. It may or it may not work out well. The experiment is demanded not by the Congress but by the Executive. If the bill passes, it will pass not because we like it or approve of it but solely because during this war we do not like to do anything to tie the hands of the President in matters connected with the conduct of the war. We shall be giving great and undefined powers to the President really at his own request. If the experiment works out successfully, well and good. The law will have justified itself. If it does not work out successfully it should no longer continue a law. And who is to decide as to the success or nonsuccess of the law; the President to whom we are giving these powers and whose acts will therefore be in judgment or the Congress which confers the powers on him? Obviously, I believe, the latter; and yet if the bill, as proposed, becomes a law, and the President is given these powers for the period of the war and one year thereafter, for the period of the war and one year thereafter he will keep them if he so wills whether we want him to or not unless we can muster a two-thirds vote to repeal the bill over his veto. In other words, in all human probability it will lie with the President and not with the Congress to decide whether or not the law shall remain in force.

The amendment which I have introduced limits the operation of the law to one year or such shorter time as the President may designate. Under the amendment at the close of the year, the law would cease to operate and matters would return automatically to the present status. If the bill proves a success, all we shall have to do will be to enact legislation extending it for a further period. If it does not prove a success, it will cease to operate under its own terms. If it is partially successful and partially not, it may be renewed in improved form. In other words, at the conclusion of one year we, of the Congress, can determine whether or not the experiment has turned out a success. If it proves successful there can be little question that the law will be extended. If not successful after a year's trial it should certainly not be continued, at least in its present form. I believe that the effect of the amendment will be to insure the safest possible use of the great powers conferred by the bill and to continue in the Congress the right to grant or withhold these powers according to whether the year shall show that the experiment has worked out well or ill.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

If any power, constitutional or not, has been inadvertently omitted from this bill, it is hereby granted in full.

[Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I assume that when the Senate fixed a limit upon debate—30 minutes upon the bill and 20 minutes upon amendments—it was an invitation to Members to participate in the debate to a moderate degree. The constitution of California requires the supreme court, when it renders a decision, also to express the reasons for the decision—a most excellent plan.

I am constitutionally opposed to all legislation of this kind; and while I favor this bill, it is because it is a war measure. It is as old as Rome, referred to so eloquently by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], that "in the midst of war law is silent"; and if the Senate feels that it has been neglected, because an appeal has been made by the country to the President to get results and to that end coordinate and consolidate, it is because the lawmaking power falls into a kind of desuetude by reason of the fact that this country is engaged in the greatest war that has ever afflicted mankind, and action is required.

This legislation is only for the period of the war and for the purposes of the war, and may be repealed at any time by the Congress.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I simply wish to state that the Senator from California is in error in ascribing to me the quotation he has just given. I did not use that quotation.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands me. I stated that the aphorism quoted by me—inter arma leges silent—is as old as the Rome which he brought into this discussion when he spoke of taking Cincinnatus from the plow. I was very much moved by the Senator's remarks. Indeed, I was so much moved that I left my chair and took the floor, because I sympathized with the spirit in which he uttered his speech more than with the sentiment. Nobody could doubt the sincerity of the Senator when he feared that by passing this legislation we would be fostering or condoning usurpation.

Washington has warned us against the dangers of usurpation; but usurpation is the taking of unauthorized power, and the President comes to Congress for the very purpose of avoiding any imputation of that kind. He wants Congress to authorize in the most general terms his exercise of the powers of the departments attached to the executive branch of this Government. He might, it is true, by suggestions to the heads of the departments—men of his appointment—to do this thing and that thing, consolidate and coordinate; but he would like to regard them, as we would, as to a very great extent independent departments, exercising powers conferred upon them by Congress; and yet we all know that the members of the Cabinet are but the arms of the President; that the Constitution in specific language charges him with executive duties. He is the only Executive, and these creations of Congress are merely his clerks. Certainly it would be usurpation if they took from the President in any sense the executive power with which he is invested by the Constitution. So far from being usurpation, this legislation is acquiescing in that other great provision of the Constitution conferring legislative powers upon the Congress; and we are here to-day legislating, acting within our functions, and because it is war time we are not specific in our decrees. We say to the President, "You are charged with inefficiency. Your departments are charged with a lack of coordination. Use this power."

It is singularly unfortunate for the Senator to have quoted George Washington, who, serene in his safe Mount Vernon home, delivered his farewell address warning against usurpation; but when he was in the field, as Woodrow Wilson is in the field to-day, fighting the battles of his country and thwarted at every step by the Congress trenching upon his powers as Commander in Chief of the Army, the same Washington asked Congress to remove all barriers and restraints and to allow him, Washington, to have the supreme command; and because he was given the supreme command in the field we finally won the battles of the Revolution.

Why was it given to Washington? Because the exigencies of the time demanded it. Because he was not suspected of usurpation. Lord Brougham says, in effect, that it will be a test of the advancement of the civilization of mankind, the appreciation with which the character of Washington is regarded in history. Up to that time usurpers were frequent, from the days of Greece and Rome down to modern times; but Washington, serving only his country, and seeking the best means to serve his country, told Congress to desist with its meddlesome tactics and allow him to fight and to win the war.

So I resent any accusation of usurpation or the countenance of usurpation or the condonation of usurpation in any vote I cast for this measure. Woodrow Wilson has been accused by no one of coveting power. He has been cast by fortune in the place where he has to exercise power, and he only asks the means by which he can, consistently with the Constitution and without usurping powers, do his work. I say this is war time. "Diseases desperate grown by desperate remedies are relieved, or not at all"; and we are now resorting, I confess, to a desperate remedy. But there is authority for it in no less a leader than Abraham Lincoln, quoted in the eloquent speech recently made by the standard bearer of the Republican Party, Mr. Hughes, in the recent campaign; and I may say, judging from this and in answer to the Senators on the other side, that their standard bearer is not with them. Lincoln says:

"I can no more be persuaded that the Government can take no strong measures in time of rebellion because it can be shown that the same could not be lawfully taken in time of peace than I can be persuaded that a particular drug is not good medicine for a sick man because it can not be shown to be good medicine for a well one."

Mr. President, we are a sick man—a very sick man—and this measure proposes medicine unpleasant to take; but I sincerely believe that if we take it we will be very much better, and for that reason I shall support the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KIRBY (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] in connection with the liberty loan campaign. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Not seeing him in the Chamber, for the present I refrain from voting.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I am informed that he would support this bill if he were present, and therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is unavoidably absent on important business. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], who are necessarily called from the Chamber, and I have been instructed to say that were they present they would vote in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I do. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] on account of illness in his family. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FALL. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. In view of the announcement that he would vote "yea" if present I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GUION. My colleague, the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], is detained at home by illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am released from my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]; and

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. BECKHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 29, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, O God, our Heavenly Father, for that wise and beneficent providence which has ever been the inspiration of our people to prosperity and greatness.

Make us wise, we beseech Thee, in our generation, that with a firm and steadfast faith in Thee we may press forward to greater achievements.

Hearten our soldiers at the front; give wisdom, skill, sagacity to their commanders; strengthen our arms and give us victory in this critical hour, that good may live and evil perish. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday and Sunday was read and approved.

WAR SUPPLIES—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 527).

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill (S. 3803) authorizing the President to sell war supplies for printing under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5803) authorizing the President during the existing emergency to sell supplies, materials, equipment, or other property, heretofore or hereafter purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States, in connection with, or incidental to, the prosecution of the war, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.
GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3803) authorizing the President during the existing emergency to sell supplies, materials, equipment, or other property, heretofore or hereafter purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States, in connection with, or incidental to, the prosecution of the war, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The difference between the two Houses consists in the fact that the Senate bill provided that the proceeds of the sale authorized in the bill should be used by each department or bureau whose products were sold, whereas the House insisted that the proceeds should be covered into the Treasury. The Senate accepted the House amendment.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that no quorum is present and evidently there is not.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill H. R. 11259.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 289, answered "present" 1, not voting 140, as follows:

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into the Committee of the Whole I would like to address the House on a question of personal privilege. I shall not take up the usual hour of the time of the House, because I realize that the subject matter I am about to discuss has been talked of and aired a number of times, but I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that I have never yet replied to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] concerning me.

The SPEAKER. What is the question of privilege founded on?

Mr. BRITTEN. The foundation of it appears in the RECORD of last Friday, at page 6147 [permanent RECORD, p. 4683]. It was the insertion in the RECORD of a speech by the gentleman from Alabama on April 5 last, about three weeks ago.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Has not the House just voted to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BRITTEN. But it has not yet gone into the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. A question of privilege is the highest thing that can arise in the House, and you can do everything with it except to interrupt a roll call.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] on April 5, three weeks ago, made a speech in which he directly or indirectly referred to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] and myself as being disloyal, or not properly patriotic in this emergency.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. To suggest to the House that the gentleman from Illinois was present when I made that speech, and replied to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says that he did not reply to it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Why, the gentleman followed me. I sat right here on the front seat and heard his speech on the 5th of April.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, addressing the Chair, does the gentleman from Alabama desire to prevent me from addressing the House this morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Alabama will desire to prevent it unless he is given an opportunity to reply, because the gentleman from Illinois did reply to me.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am almost inclined, then, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw my request in order to obviate that spectacle.

Mr. STAFFORD. That would be a terrible price.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to call the attention of the House to the basis for my question of privilege. It is this: That while the gentleman made his speech on April 5 his remarks were not inserted in the RECORD until the day before yesterday, and there was no opportunity of replying.

The SPEAKER. What is it the gentleman from Alabama said about which the gentleman from Illinois desires to talk?

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman presented a statement written by T. Everett Harre, an irresponsible writer, published by the American Defense Society, and sent broadcast, in which one Sylvester Viereck, of New York, boasted of having written a bill which I introduced in Congress. That is the basis of my raising the question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Did I understand that the gentleman from Illinois arises to a question of personal privilege? I was not present in the Chamber at the time he took the floor.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And that he states that an article was inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Alabama, and if I remember correctly was read from the floor of the House, and that that constitutes the question of personal privilege?

The SPEAKER. Yes. It is owing entirely to what was in the document.

Mr. GARNER. Just one suggestion, if I may, while I am upon my feet, without interrupting the gentleman. If statements made by gentlemen on the floor of the House can later on be made the basis for questions of personal privilege, there is no doubt but that the time of this House can be consumed each day in each week until the end of the session with questions of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state over again that the proper way, the direct way, the easy way, the short way, when one gentleman makes a statement which another gentleman claims to be unwarranted, upon the floor of the House, is to have the words taken down and have the House immediately deal with it. The gentleman from Illinois finds himself in this situation, however: That the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama were never printed until last Friday.

Mr. GARNER. I am not going to controvert that statement, but the gentleman from Alabama did insert what purported to be his remarks in the next morning's RECORD.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, the gentleman is thinking of an entirely different speech, one that has nothing to do with this subject matter.

Mr. GARNER. I think myself where a Member is not present and statements are made concerning him by another Member on the floor of the House he ought to have the opportunity to reply to it, but where a Member is present and a statement is made affecting him, if he does not refer to it at the time he ought to be estopped from further taking up the time of the House in respect to it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman think that I have a proper basis for a question of personal privilege when a Member gets on the floor of this House and says that a certain man in New York claims authorship of a bill, a very important bill, which I had introduced?

Mr. GARNER. Well, I will answer that by asking the gentleman this question: Did not the gentleman reply to it at that time?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; he replied at that time.

Mr. BRITTEN. I attempted to reply to it briefly at that time, and would have specifically replied in the intervening time, but the speech was three weeks ago, and the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama had not been inserted in the RECORD until the day before yesterday. The speech to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] refers, which was corrected in the RECORD by the gentleman from Alabama, was one in which certain typographical errors were made last Thursday, and therefore appeared in the RECORD two days in succession.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Illinois was present when I read this statement given out by this American Defense Society. He then denied that Viereck wrote this bill in question and said he wrote it himself. Now he wants to reply again to a question which he has already denied and which I did not dispute after he said Viereck did not write the bill, but he wrote it himself. I am just asking for a square deal, Mr. Speaker; all I ask is fair treatment at the hands of the House and everybody else. I do not think the gentleman ought to be permitted to take up the time of this House to answer a speech that I made when he was present and to which he replied on that very day.

The SPEAKER. If he replied on that very day——

Mr. HEFLIN. He spoke that very day, immediately following me.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I had permission to address the House for five minutes that day, and when my time expired it was extended another five minutes, and it was not on the question of personal privilege. While I followed what the gentleman from Alabama had said, there was no way of knowing positively what he said, because he talked for 30 minutes or more, until——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Until his speech appeared in the RECORD on Saturday.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has not yet pointed out the language to which he objects.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am just about to do that, if the gentleman will allow me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not had any chance.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has said it was remarks appearing in the RECORD of Friday, made on April 5, and it seems the remarks he referred to were read at that time by the gentleman from Alabama and that the gentleman replied during the discussion. I have no desire to interfere with the controversy——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Has not the Chair ruled that the gentleman from Illinois might proceed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has, but the gentleman from Arkansas is in his rights.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Regular order!

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to interfere with the controversy, but our Committee on Mines and Mining wants to go ahead with the war-minerals bill. If the gentleman has a question of personal privilege to which he has not replied, it might be necessary; but I think the gentleman will agree with me that the gentleman from Alabama in making his speech read what the gentleman now objects to. I was present at the time—and the gentleman from Alabama has not put in the RECORD, as I understand it, any additional new matter—and the gentleman from Illinois rose and made an explanation of the criticism made by this defense society and of the correspondence in which he protested against it and where they acknowledge that it was an error; now I submit under orderly procedure the gentleman having replied showing it was an unjust charge against him that it is not proper to rise a second time in explanation of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that point, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6147, of Friday, April 26 [permanent RECORD, p. 4683], contained remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] made on the floor of the House some three weeks prior to that date. My basis for the request for personal privilege is in the following statement. The gentleman from Alabama said:

I hold here a statement issued this year by Mr. Harre, of the Council of Defense—

When he was in error—

or the American Defense Society, who talks about this bill and says that Viereck, the traitor in New York, who was the editor of the Fatherland, notoriously against this Government, notoriously in sympathy with Germany, that—on the afternoon of June 25, the day upon which this bill was introduced by Congressman BRITTEN, of Illinois, Mr. Viereck read to me the text of the bill proposing that citizens of German or Austrian birth or descent upon their request should be exempted from military service in foreign lands.

Here is what Mr. Harre is supposed to have said—

Then the gentleman from Alabama was interrupted by Mr. SWITZER.

Will the gentleman yield? By whom is that issued, what society?

Mr. HEFLIN. By T. Everett Harre, and these extracts are signed by the secretary of the American Defense Society. Now, gentlemen, what do you think of that—that Viereck wrote that bill. Did he send it to the Member from Illinois? How came that bill here? How came it to be introduced in this body? Those are questions that we must consider.

And then, in his own handwriting, the gentleman from Alabama inserted, outside of the typewritten record:

While our boys are fighting at the front we must not fail to do our duty here. [Applause.]

The champion applauder for the other side has applause on the brain.

In order to make certain that this speech as it appeared in the RECORD on Friday morning was an exact counterpart of the speech as it was delivered on the floor of the House, I sent for the original typewritten copy, which I have here. With a few exceptions the speech is identical with the remarks made by the gentleman on the floor.

But he said:

Now, gentlemen, let me say in conclusion, let us stand together and all together by the President, this great American, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy.

And then he has put the word "applause" in there, for fear the House and gallery did not quite appreciate the importance of it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is complaining, under a question of personal privilege, of the gentleman from Alabama writing "applause" after some remarks that do not refer to the gentleman from Illinois. I have no objection to his proceeding under personal privilege, but in order to save time——

The SPEAKER. I think the gentleman had best omit that.

Mr. BRITTEN. The speech has been changed by adding a number of "applauses," and the word "loud" before the final "applause."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. To say that the word "applause" is not inserted anywhere except where applause occurred on the floor.

Mr. WINGO. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. WINGO. The point of order is that both gentlemen are discussing the word "applause."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is entirely correct. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] will stick to his text.

Mr. BRITTEN. I shall refrain further from talking about "applause." A little further down in the gentleman's remarks of April 5 he uses this language:

Gentlemen—

Referring to my bill—

If that is Americanism, I can not subscribe to the doctrine. If that is loyalty to the boys at the front and to the flag, then I am not loyal myself.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman refers to my bill. He does not necessarily say it is disloyal. He does not say that I am unpatriotic, but he characterizes the entire matter as being disloyal from his point of view, and he has here repeatedly slapped his ponderous chest and indicated what he has in his heart against 14 Members of Congress. He has repeatedly mentioned my name among them—14 Members who, from his point of view, according to the dictates of his heart, are disloyal to the Government. I do not mean to impugn the patriotism of any Member of this House, and I never did.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is not speaking of the charge that the gentleman from Alabama made when he charged Mr. Viereck with having written his bill. That is the charge. I do insist that the gentleman shall stick to the charge that has been made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, on page 5510 of the RECORD, in the corrected copy of the gentleman's remarks of April 23, the gentleman from Alabama, referring to both Mr. MASON and myself, said these words—and, by the way, he was referring to his Age-Herald editorial—

Now, whoever furnished the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] with the editorial attacking me, misrepresenting me, charging me falsely with having said the speech——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is reading what the gentleman from Alabama objected to about the Age-Herald. It has nothing to do with the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order.

Mr. BRITTEN. I was using the gentleman's remarks, and was going to have them apply to my own position to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is at liberty to quote anything stated by the gentleman from Alabama reflecting on him and making a statement about that. That is absolutely fair. But to drag up the Age-Herald here again——

Mr. BRITTEN. I will not drag that in again without the permission of the House. I will get at it in this way: The gentleman from Alabama said he did not understand why the gentleman from Illinois was not dealing fairly by him, and when he presented the article from the Age-Herald—that is, the editorial—he also ought to have presented a subsequent editorial.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the same point of order. The gentleman is repeating the same offense.

Mr. BRITTEN. All right, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will leave out the Age-Herald.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will leave that out. He said that in presenting certain matters before the House, as a matter of fairness to the gentleman from Alabama, both statements should be presented.

Mr. WINGO. I insist on the point of order. The gentleman is referring to a question of privilege that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] might have.

Mr. BRITTEN. Which I also have.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] was not mentioned in that controversy with reference to the Age-Herald, and I insist that he confine himself——

The SPEAKER. If the Age-Herald had nothing to say about the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], the Chair thinks it is out of place.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time I will send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the American Defense Society, written the day after the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] addressed the House, April 6, and also a statement accompanying that letter, which I would like to have the Clerk read to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it, without objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY (INC.),
New York, April 6, 1918.

Hon. FRED A. BRITTEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BRITTEN: Your letter is a little obscure, for you have heretofore characterized the statement made by Mr. Harre as emanating from this society; and you mention that Mr. HEFLIN read into the RECORD a copy of the Defense Society's statement concerning it; but I can not tell whether you refer to that or to the recent news release, a copy of which I inclose. If the latter, it probably did no harm; and if the former, any harm that it did can be immediately counteracted by reading this inclosed statement.

Yours, truly,

HENRY C. QUINBY,
Chairman Executive Committee.

STATEMENT BY AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY.

MARCH 27, 1918.

On [blank date] an article appeared in a number of newspapers purporting to be issued with the approval of the American Defense Society, and written by Mr. T. Everett Harre, in which the writer attempted to show the connection between George Sylvester Viereck, of New York, and certain men of influence in the Nation's Capitol at Washington.

Among other things, the article attributed to Mr. Viereck the boast that he was the author of H. R. 5184, introduced in Congress on June 25, 1917, by Representative FRED A. BRITTEN, of Chicago, the title of which bill was "To authorize the President to exempt from foreign military service, upon their request, such citizens of German or Austrian birth or descent whose blood ties in the enemy country might discourage the supreme effort that is necessary for the victory of our troops on foreign soil."

Mr. Viereck has since denied making this statement, and upon Congressman BRITTEN'S assurance that there is not the slightest truth in it the society is willing to correct any injustice which may have been done to Mr. BRITTEN in the premises, and to say that it has confidence in Mr. BRITTEN'S attitude, irrespective of whether Mr. Viereck did or did not make the statement attributed to him.

Mr. BRITTEN explains that his bill was introduced for the sole purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Army and with no intention to provide an evasion of the draft law.

Mr. Harre's article said that the Britten bill "was in line with another bill to repeal the conscription law for raising the National Army," which might have led the reader to believe that Mr. BRITTEN was also the author of this bill, while in fact he voted for the conscription law and made a speech in its favor on the floor of the House. The inference, therefore, is entirely erroneous.

Congressman BRITTEN is entitled to a correction of the statement made by Mr. Harre that "the Congressman from the ninth district of Illinois, who introduced the bill, was one of those men specifically characterized by President Wilson as willful men, who have attempted to frustrate and hinder the prompt passage of legislation necessary for this Nation's conduct of the war."

The President's reference to a "little group of willful men" was made on March 4, 1917, prior to our entrance into the war, and was directed against the Senators who had succeeded in talking to death a bill "authorizing the President to arm American merchant ships," and for which bill Mr. BRITTEN had voted favorably in the House on March 1, 1917.

[Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the article referred to and presented to the House by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was quite a lengthy one. It covered two columns, closely printed. The author, T. Everett Harre, an unreliable newspaper man, by some method had his article sent out by the American Defense Society, a pure mistake, as indicated in the letter just read. As soon as the American Defense Society learned of its mistake it issued a second statement, which was dated March 27, a week prior to the date of the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. I will use his language as closely as I can when I say that if Mr. HEFLIN had desired to be fair to me he would have had this second statement read as well as the first. Those are almost the identical words, boiled down, used by Mr. HEFLIN when referring to Mr. MASON the other day for not having presented the second statement of a certain newspaper in Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I never saw this other statement. If I had seen this other statement, I would not have read the first one. It is not a question now as to who wrote the bill. The fact remains that the bill was introduced by the gentleman, and I was criticizing the purpose of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BRITTEN. If my bill is subject to criticism, and if I am to be designated by anybody as disloyal or unpatriotic because of attempting to improve the draft law, I think that Congress ought to know my position in the premises. If my bill is in error, every word of it or any one word of it, if my bill is not true and patriotic, then the words of the President of the United States might be equally criticized. I hold in my hand a letter from Adjt. Gen. McCain, dated April 15, 1918, just two weeks ago, in which he says:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 15, 1918.

Hon. FRED A. BRITTEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BRITTEN: In compliance with your request, there is inclosed herewith advanced copy of general orders promulgating Executive order defining the status of conscientious objectors in the military service.

Very truly, yours,

H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

Now, my bill was intended to improve the military service.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman's question of personal privilege goes to a statement attributed to a certain gentleman, making the false charge that that gentleman had written a bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois. Now, I am perfectly willing to have the gentleman attempt to discuss the merits of the bill, but not under the guise of a question of personal privilege. The question of the merits of his bill that he introduced is not a question of personal privilege. The question of personal privilege is that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] had quoted a man as claiming to have written that bill which the gentleman introduced. That is a different question. This is a question of the merits of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say with respect to the point of order that the statement the gentleman from Illinois is now about to make goes to the very crux of his question of personal privilege. He proposes to show that he is not disloyal, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] evidently would stop him at that point.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I object to the gentleman's remark.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the Chair can not anticipate, and nobody can anticipate, what the gentleman is going to say. This bill, whatever it is, was the cause of the trouble, it seems, on which the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was based; and inasmuch as the thing is up, it looks to the Chair as though the gentleman has the right to explain his bill.

Mr. WINGO. If the Speaker will indulge me in just one statement, the question of privilege is not the charge of disloyalty, but the charge that some one else wrote the bill that the gentleman introduced.

The SPEAKER. That was one part of it.

Mr. WINGO. And if he raises the question that some one has charged him with disloyalty, of course the gentleman is entitled to be heard on that charge.

The SPEAKER. That is what he has raised two or three times.

Mr. WINGO. If he wants to discuss and establish his loyalty, certainly I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BRITTEN. I should like to suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that it is not necessary for me to establish my loyalty.

Mr. WINGO. I did not say it was. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made that suggestion. I did not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not permit debate between Members and the gentleman who has the floor about this thing.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, my name has been repeatedly connected with the names of other Members of Congress by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] as being unpatriotic from his point of view, and he has always used this particular bill to indicate how he arrived at that conclusion as far as I was concerned; and I think I ought to have the right to explain to the House the character of my bill, and just what the President of the United States thinks of it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I do not.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will admonish the gentleman from Illinois that he has got nothing to do with those other 14, if that is the number, and he will attend to his own case.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. BLACKMON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACKMON. As I understand it, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] was given the right to speak to a question of personal privilege with reference to something that occurred a day or so ago. Now, in speaking to his question of personal privilege he goes back three or four weeks, to discuss something that happened three or four weeks or a month ago.

The SPEAKER. Well, it was the thing that happened several days ago that he was complaining of.

Mr. BLACKMON. But can he recite the history of what the gentleman from Alabama has been saying or what he says he has been saying for a long time before?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do the best he can to hold the gentleman to the direct line.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker I will read a part of the Executive order of March 20, 1918, signed by Woodrow Wilson, The White House. It is by order of the Secretary of War; Peyton C. March, Major General, acting Chief of Staff; and marked "Official: H. P. McCain, Adjutant General."

"I hereby declare that the following military service is noncombatant service:

a. Service in the Medical Corps wherever performed. This includes the sanitary detachments attached to combatant units at the front; service in the divisional sanitary trains composed of ambulance companies and field-hospital companies, on the line of communications, at the base in France, and with the troops and hospitals in the United States; also the service of supply and repair in the Medical Department.

b. Any service in the Quartermaster Corps, in the United States may be treated as noncombatant. Also in rear of zone of operations, service in the following: Stevedore companies, labor companies, remount depots, veterinary hospitals, supply depots, bakery companies, the subsistence service, the bathing service, the laundry service, the salvage service, the clothing renovation service, the shoe-repair service, the transportation repair service, the motor-truck companies.

c. Any engineer service in the United States may be treated as noncombatant service. Also, in rear of zone of operations, service as follows: Rebuilding buildings, operation and repair; road building and repair; construction of rear-line fortifications, auxiliary defenses, etc., construction of docks, wharves, storehouses, and of such cantonments as may be built by the Corps of Engineers; topographical work; camouflage; map reproduction; supply-depot service; hydraulic service; and forestry service.

2. Persons ordered to report for military service under the above act who have (a) been certified by their local boards to be members of a religious sect or organization as defined in section 4 of said act, or (b) who object to participating in war because of conscientious scruples, but have failed to receive certificates as members of a religious sect or organization from their local board, will be assigned to noncombatant military service as defined in paragraph 1 to the extent that such persons are able to accept service as aforesaid without violation of the religious or other conscientious scruples by them in good faith entertained.

Now, let us see how the very object of my bill differs from the President's desires, if at all. What is the object of this Executive order?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the gentleman reading an order or The Adjutant General or the Secretary of War or the President which exempts from military service religious and conscientious objectors to war in defense of his bill, which exempts boys of German blood and Austrian blood from fighting for the flag. The Secretary has not said, and the President has not said, that he exempts from service men of German and Austrian blood or descent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman can not, under the guise of a point of order, make statements of that kind.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was stating my reasons.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have stricken from the RECORD the attempt of the gentleman to disguise himself in the American flag during my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, in revising my remarks may I have the privilege of striking from the RECORD the pretended patriotic remarks of the gentleman from Alabama?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois objects to the language of the gentleman from Alabama, he can have the words taken down.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is not worth the while.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois was recognized and had the floor. The gentleman from Alabama injected some remarks into his speech without permission of the Chair. Does not the gentleman from Illinois have the right to strike out those remarks?

The SPEAKER. The rule about that is this: Speaker Reed taught me a lesson in regard to it. One day I was making a speech, and I thought I was making a good one. I wound up with a long rhetorical sentence, and right in the middle of it Mr. Steele, of Indiana, popped up and asked me a question which had nothing on the top of the earth to do with it. I answered his question and then went back and repeated the sentence, and then when it was brought to me I struck his question and my answer out. The next morning he rose to a question of privilege and wanted to know why it was stricken out. Mr. Reed asked me, and I told him it had nothing in the world to do with my speech, and I did not propose to have a good sentence like that ruined by Gov. Steele or anybody else. Then, as I say, the Speaker taught me a lesson. He said that when a man has the floor and another gentleman interrupts him to ask him a question and he answers it he has no right to strike it out, but that if a man breaks in without permission on the gentleman who has the floor and gets his remarks in the gentleman making the speech has a perfect right to cut them out, or if he declines to yield and the man insists on interrupting he has a right to cut them out.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In connection with the question of order that was raised, I do not think the record is exactly straight. Of course, the gentleman from Alabama can not break into the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois without his permission, but the gentleman from Alabama made a point of order that the gentleman from Illinois was not proceeding in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has disposed of that.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And therefore I submit that the gentleman from Illinois has no right to strike the remarks out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Chair a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may proceed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from Alabama to make a point of order, and the Chair permitted him to proceed for some time.

The SPEAKER. There was no way of stopping him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask by way of answering whether the Chair ruled upon that point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then should it go into the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois without his consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama made the point of order and then some remarks in pursuance of that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the Speaker what would be the remedy to stop the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] from injecting his remarks under these circumstances?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. The Chair is doing the best he can. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the House I will say that the bill to exempt those having warm blood ties from service abroad was not a hastily prepared measure. I took the matter up with some of the greatest fighting generals in the Army to-day, not reserve officers, whose opinions might be biased or whose sentiments might have been swayed prior to our entry into the world war, but officers in the Regular Army, generals in the Army; and one distinguished officer, who is doing wonderful service to-day, said to me: "BRITTEN, I would not send that character of man to the other side, because he would not make a good soldier. Your bill is perfectly proper and highly desirable; go ahead, introduce that kind of a bill." How valuable would a man be in the terrible game of war if he did not want to fight? I distinctly recall the parallel that was drawn for me by this general that afternoon in his office. He said: "BRITTEN, supposing there were three American soldiers in the ditch, backed up against the wall, and one of them had warm blood ties and was weak-hearted and did not want to fight or kill. Do you know what would happen if they were attacked by three Germans or three Austrians? All three of our fellows would be killed, because of the weak link in that chain of three. He would not have the ambition or the nerve or the desire to kill when fighting his next of kin on the other side, and that character of man should not be sent into the first-line trenches and is not being sent to the first-line trenches to-day." The President's order is the best evidence of it.

To increase and improve the efficiency of the Army something along this line was necessary, and it is being done to-day. The desires of my bill are now in effect, just as though Congress had passed it favorably. Mr. Speaker, there are many matters which I would like to bring to the attention of the House in connection with my being an honorary member of the American Defense Society, which issued this erroneous statement presented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]—an honorary member because of my desire to put the country in a state of preparedness, when Members like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] were voting contrary to that desire and fighting against any preparedness; but, of course, if I should proceed along that line gentlemen on the other side of the House will say that I am not talking to the point of order. Therefore on some other occasion I expect to show a great many votes against preparedness measures for many of which the gentleman is voting favorably to-day.

I shall show that many appropriations that he is voting for to-day he voted against in times gone by. His foresight was not as good as his hindsight, and at another time I shall bring that matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to know anything about parliamentary law, but the issue on which the gentleman rose——

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I am through. I do not desire to use any more time. I want to thank the House for listening to me. I realize that this debate, if it may properly be called a debate, between the gentleman from Alabama and Members of Congress whom he has so maliciously and wrongfully characterized has dragged and dragged until the House is finally disgusted with it. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. COOPER of West Virginia for one week, to participate in the liberty-bond campaign in his district.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that.

Mr. EAGLE. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259 is agreed to.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, what is the parliamentary status?

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose on Saturday last an amendment had been offered and a substitute for that amendment and an amendment to the amendment. The question, of course, will arise, first, on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] was prevented from submitting his request by reason of the House having already voted to go into the Committee of the Whole. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for 10 minutes. He very seldom addresses the House, and whenever he does it is always to the point and of value.

Mr. ROBBINS. On what subject?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, do I understand the request of the gentleman from Arkansas to be that the gentleman from Texas be privileged to speak out of order on a question not in order on the bill under consideration?

Mr. WINGO. That is my understanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I ask that the unanimous-consent request be coupled with the further request that a gentleman on this side be privileged to proceed for 10 minutes on a subject that is not in order on this bill. If the gentleman having charge of this bill wishes to delay the consideration of it by interminable discussion of outside matters we might as well have 10 minutes on each side.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, of course I have been trying to keep down discussion as much as possible, but the gentleman from Texas does not occupy much time, and if he wants 10 minutes I have not any objection to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been suggested since I made my request that it might be half an hour.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall object to any half hour. Let me say this in all kindness, that after these two speeches of the gentlemen who shall share this time I shall object to any more time being consumed that does not apply strictly to the bill and the matter in hand.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire, through the courtesy of the gentleman from Texas, whether it has anything to do with the cause celebre, Heflin-Britten-Mason?

Mr. EAGLE. It is in reference to one phase of it, in order to express my belief that the matter has gone far enough, and to hope that the spirit of fraternity may succeed that of belligerency.

Mr. STAFFORD. I raise no objection to that commendable spirit of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I represent here in this Congress a district that has all of the elements that I can imagine in the American population—city people and country people, northern people and southern people, Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestants, prohibitionists and antiprohibitionists, labor and capital. I come from the far Southwest; and yet in the five years I have been here I believe on no occasion, by my speech or my vote or my conversation, has provincialism or partisanship actuated me. New England and the East are my country; the golden Pacific slope is my country; the mighty manufacturing North is my country, even with its foreign population being assimilated there; and equally my beloved South is my country. It is our common country. Every vote I cast and every speech I make, though they are very few, and every sentiment of my heart are for one country with one common future. [Applause.] It has been painful to me as an American who hopes himself patriotic that in the different views we entertain and different sentiments we have in reference to the mighty questions that shake this Nation from shore to shore and in the solution of which the whole round world is involved, gentlemen whose personal friendship is dear to me, irrespective of the section whence they come, irrespective of the constituency which they represent, shall in the discharge of their conscientious duties come to unkind words and precipitate continuously for the disturbance of our deliberations emotions that tend sometimes to gather men into groups and sections and parties in anger, and that give comfort to those of this Nation who are not whole-heartedly for the prosecution of this war. I know each of those gentlemen fundamentally in his heart wishes our sacred cause to prevail, and would not be willing for enemies to say that our councils are divided. My friends, this very hour men from Texas are joining men from Illinois, the home of some of these belligerent statesmen; they are joining men from Alabama, the home of one gentleman who participates in these deliberations of belligerency; they are joining men who come from all the other States—in one vast fraternal, sacred enterprise. What do those soldier boys know about any emotions except duty?

Let us quit these unseemly wrangles. [Applause.] We have had enough of it. I know the gentleman from Alabama, and his purposes are just and patriotic even if he is impetuous. I know the gentleman from Illinois, and there is not a kinder heart in America; and I am tired of hearing these gentlemen quarrel with each other to the distraction of the House and the injury of public business. When several hundred thousand of our boys, from California to Maine and from Illinois down to the Gulf of Mexico, are in the trenches on the front in Flanders and in France, with shot and shell and dynamite from whirring aeroplanes pouring destruction in their midst; with others on the sea, where the cowardly submarine is lurking for them; when this Nation is spending its treasure and preparing to spend its blood as freely, and more so, than any Nation in all recorded time, without hope of compensation in land or treasure or anything else except the preservation of its sacred ideals; buckling on its armor to do its duty to civilization, let us cease these wrangles, and let these gentlemen, having given and taken in combats of words, now give and take the right hand of fellowship and declare that, instead of quarreling any more with each other, they will join every one of the rest of us and give our undivided time, thought, and energy to our quarrel against the infamous forces that are endeavoring to destroy our Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I just ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the tone of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] strikes a responsive chord in the heart of every man. So far as I am concerned, the personal equation I would wipe out as cheerfully as I would do the most pleasant thing in life.

But I appeal to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] whether, if he had given everything he could give to his country, and his reputation for loyalty and patriotism was assailed upon this floor, he would not in duty to his family and to his country, and to the boy that is carrying a gun for my country, resent it? Should I be silent when they assail my reputation for loyalty to my country under those circumstances? [Applause.] Let the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] correct the statement he has made in regard to me, let him leave me without the sting of insulting remarks to the effect that I am working for the Kaiser, when I have given everything I could; let him correct the statement he made misquoting my words in the last speech he made, and I will be silent; but so help me God, whenever a man assails my loyalty to my country, I would be a dishonest sire of an honest American boy, who is fighting for his country, if I did not reply and defend the good name of my family. [Applause.] And I intend to reply to that, gentlemen, within the next 24 hours unless corrections are made of such misstatements. I shall rise to a question of personal privilege.

But I thank the gentleman from Texas for his kindly offer of mediation. I thank everybody who is willing to stop it. Has it not been my continuous plea, and has not the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] insulted me and made fun of me, because of it, to "Let us quit fighting each other and fight the Kaiser"? He repeats it but to ridicule me, and I would be unworthy to represent the great State of Illinois if I did not have the courage and the grit to defend my State, to defend myself, and to defend the honor of my own family. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to offer a substitute for the McKeown amendment? As I understand that amendment, it is not a substitute for the Sanders amendment but an amendment to that amendment. Now, the inquiry that I wanted to submit was this, namely, would it be in order for me to offer a substitute to the McKeown amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see if the Chair understands the situation. If there is an amendment there may be an amendment to that amendment. There may be a substitute to that amendment and amendment to that substitute. Now, do I understand the amendment offered to the amendment is not a substitute but an amendment?

Mr. BLACK. The McKeown amendment is offered as a substitute.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have the amendment to the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 9, line 8, after the word "who," insert "in order to enhance the price of necessaries."

The CHAIRMAN. That is the first amendment. Now the Clerk will report the substitute to that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana as a substitute for the Sanders amendment: Page 9, line 8, after the word "who," insert "unlawfully."

Amendment offered by Mr. MCKEOWN to the amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Add the words "or for the purpose of impeding the Government in carrying on the war," so as to read: "In order to enhance the price of necessaries or for the purpose of impeding the Government in carrying on the war."

Mr. CANNON. In what line is that last amendment?

Mr. HAMLIN. The same line and the same place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] that the Chair stated the status of the situation correctly. There was an amendment, and then there was an amendment to that amendment, and then there was a substitute for the amendment—not the amendment to the amendment, but the original amendment. Now, that substitute is amendable.

Mr. BLACK. But not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN]? I can not offer a substitute for that. I offer a substitute, then, for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the parliamentary situation, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] offered an amendment to this section and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] then offered an amendment to that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No. He offered a substitute to that amendment.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] offered a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. No. That is a mistake. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] offered the amendment and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] offered a substitute for the Sanders amendment, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] offered an amendment to the Sanders amendment, which, you see, would be voted on first.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand. Then the gentleman from Texas could not be permitted to offer a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. For the Sanders amendment?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. No. There has been a substitute offered to the Sanders amendment.

Mr. WINGO. The only thing that would be in order would be an amendment to the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. The Chair stated that. There is no difficulty about the situation when you get the facts. The first vote would come on the amendment to the Sanders amendment. That is a perfecting proposition on the amendment to the Sanders amendment. Without objection, the Clerk will report the Sanders amendment and then the McKeown amendment to the Sanders amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 9, line 8, after the word "who," insert "in order to enhance the price of necessaries."

Amendment offered by Mr. MCKEOWN to the amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Add the words "or for the purpose of impeding the Government in carrying on the war," so that the Sanders amendment as amended would read: "In order to enhance the price of necessaries or for the purpose of impeding the Government in carrying on the war."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute for the amended amendment.

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can have an agreement that we may read the balance of the bill without interruption, and then amendments might be offered and discussion had for two or three hours, whatever is thought best.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have observed that these agreements, when made, always result in the utmost confusion and always result in men coming here and voting upon propositions upon which they have heard no debate; and while I desire to expedite the bill, the experience that I have observed in the House does not warrant me in consenting that such an agreement be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his request. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the President is authorized from time to time, whenever in his judgment it may be required for the successful prosecution of the war, to requisition necessaries, and to requisition, or otherwise provide, storage facilities for such necessaries; and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor. Compensation provided for under this section shall be paid from the appropriation made by section 18 of this act. If the compensation so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such necessaries or storage space, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to perfect the text. Add, after the words "United States," in line 5 of page 10, these words, "as provided in section 12 of this act." If you will turn to section 12, you will there find a specific reference to the Judicial Code, under which this proceeding is to be instituted. In this section that is entirely omitted, and it ought to be included, so that there will be no mistake about the remedy that is to be invoked. It is merely to perfect the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 10, line 5, after the words "United States," insert "as provided in section 12 of this act."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard in opposition to the amendment. The proceeding provided for in this section is not upon all fours with the proceeding provided for in section 12. This section provides for the requisition of necessaries; that is, for the requisition of the chemical elements provided in the bill, the compensation to be determined by the district courts with a jury. The process provided for in section 12 is for a hearing or the trial of the cause before the Court of Claims, which is a proper method of procedure in the case there prescribed, where it is proposed to take over a plant with a great many different elements and involving a very large amount of money. The process is a court proceeding, and is, as I stated, intended to cover those cases where the property taken is of large extent and the question to be considered is difficult and technical.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. What is the proceeding provided for in section 10?

Mr. ANDERSON. The proceeding provided for in section 10 is a proceeding in the district court instead of the Court of Claims, and that permits the man who has property taken to try his case in his own judicial district, where the property is taken. We made this same distinction in the food law and made it on mature consideration.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment. I see I was mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is authorized from time to time to use the funds provided under section 18 to enter into contracts for necessaries for periods of not exceeding two years, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell necessaries at reasonable prices to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President: Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 14 of this act, then the price paid for any such articles so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize entering into contracts under this act after the termination of the war. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal by the United States of necessaries under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 13, page 10, the words "to use the funds provided under section 18."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 10, line 13, strike out the words "to use the funds provided under section 18."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion because if the amendment proposed by the committee to section 18, which makes those sections mere authorizations for an appropriation instead of an appropriation, is adopted the words which I move to strike out would have no meaning in connection with this section. In fact, I think they have none, anyway, because with those words stricken out the language would read:

The Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is authorized from time to time to enter into contracts.

That is exactly what is sought to permit to be done by this section.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is right about that. But what is intended by this fund that is sought to be provided in section 18 is that it should be used in buying these necessaries.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, if an appropriation is made for the purposes of this act. Whether in this bill or in an appropriation bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations, that money will be available to carry out the purposes of this act, either to pay the amounts called for by these contracts or for any other purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman thinks they could do it just the same when the appropriation is made?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. You may be right about that.

Mr. ANDERSON. I take it that you will have two appropriations to carry out this bill, whether the appropriation section remains in it or not—one for administrative purposes, for stenographers, clerk hire, and experts, rent, and everything of that sort, and then you will have an appropriation of a general fund for the administration of the act, which I take it will be a revolving fund, out of which all the expenses of the administration of the act will be paid. The contracts will be taken up, the purchases will be made, and everything of that kind will be done under the general appropriation, as in the case of the Food and Fuel Administration.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman knows that no part of this $50,000,000 will be used for the purpose of paying any expenses.

Mr. ANDERSON. The appropriation of $50,000,000, I take it, is an appropriation for the administration of the act in the sense of buying the minerals or elements specified in the bill, paying for property requisitioned, and fulfilling contracts. Now, if no appropriation is made in the bill—and it may not be—then this language is entirely foreign to this section.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think the gentleman's motion to strike out is absolutely necessary, because as it reads now all that the President is authorized to do is to use the fund. He is not authorized to enter into contracts.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And what you evidently intend to authorize the President to do is to enter into contracts, not to use the funds to enter into contracts at all. In other words, it is stronger and broader and clearer if you strike out what the gentleman proposes than if it is in there.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from New York is quite right.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is correct about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CARAWAY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

S. 3388. An act to amend the emergency shipping fund provisions of the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 15, 1917, so as to empower the President and his designated agents to take over certain transportation systems for the transportation of shipyard and plant employees and for other purposes; and

S. 4292. An act to conserve the gold supply of the United States, to permit the settlement in silver of trade balances adverse to the United States, to provide silver for subsidiary coinage and for commercial use, to assist foreign Governments at war with the enemies of the United States, and for the above purposes to stabilize the price and encourage the production of silver.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, my attention has just been directed to a matter that I think the attention of the committee ought to be called to. The second proviso of this section reads as follows:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize entering into contracts under this act after the termination of the war.

But this act provides for the purchase and sale of certain minerals under certain conditions. Now, it has been suggested to me—and, I think, with considerable force—that it might happen that at the time the war terminated the Government might have on hand a lot of these minerals or materials for which it would have no use in the world, except to dispose of them to the people who consumed them, and that to sell them after that time would involve the making of contracts. Each sale would be a contract, and it has been suggested to me that there ought to be some exception to this direct prohibition against the making of contracts after the termination of the war. It had occurred to me that perhaps we ought to insert after the word "war" the words "except so far as it shall be necessary in order to dispose of any material which may be in the possession of the Government at that time," limiting the right to make contracts to the disposal of whatever material might be on hand and in possession of the Government at the time the war is terminated. I have not offered that yet as an amendment. I am simply making a suggestion.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Let me suggest to the gentleman that instead of the language he suggests we use this language—

Except to sell materials on hand.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is better.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is shorter.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is better. I think there ought to be something of that kind to allow the Government to dispose of materials on hand. I offer that amendment, to insert on page 10, line 24, the words "except to sell materials then on hand."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAMLIN: Page 10, line 24, after the word "war," insert "except to sell materials then on hand."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I suggest to the gentleman that he might use the words "dispose of" instead of "sell."

Mr. HAMLIN. I am perfectly willing to substitute the words "dispose of" for the word "sell," so that it will read:

Except to dispose of materials then on hand.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That means that contracts may be entered into for that purpose.

Mr. HAMLIN. Only to dispose of materials that might be on hand at the close of the war.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What would become of the money? Would it go into the Treasury or into the revolving fund?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is specifically provided for. It goes into the Treasury. It says that any money not needed in the revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What becomes of the revolving fund?

Mr. HAMLIN. That goes back into the Treasury as soon as there is no further use for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. When will there be no further use for it?

Mr. HAMLIN. As soon as this business is closed up after the war is ended.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Section 11 provides for the entering into contracts for necessaries. Now, if you add the provision suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], is there any danger of that being construed to prevent the Government from selling such necessaries as it finds it essential to purchase under section 14 to protect guaranties? In other words, under this bill you have the right to guarantee to any producer that he shall have a certain price for all of the necessaries that he produces. Now, in order to protect the Government in a certain way you permit the Government to purchase under that section.

Mr. HAMLIN. I see the gentleman's point—that in case the Government should enter into a contract under the minimum-price provision of this bill——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not exactly enter into a contract, but guarantee——

Mr. HAMLIN. Guarantee the minimum price, and the war should suddenly terminate, then we might have to protect ourselves by purchasing the materials.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. We are very likely to have that. In other words, if we guarantee a certain price, especially if more is produced than is used in ordinary channels, the Government is going to be compelled to purchase that, because otherwise it would have to pay the producer so much money, and the Government will purchase those necessaries. However, in the section which gives the right to purchase to protect the guaranty there is also a provision authorizing the sale; but when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] proposed his amendment, it occurred to me that that might be in conflict with the right to sell. Would it not be preferable to say that nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize entering into contracts for the purchasing of such necessaries under this act after the termination of the war? That would leave the Government the right to store and to provide storage facilities for, and to sell.

Mr. HAMLIN. That has got to be done. I see the gentleman's point, and I can conceive of a condition that might arise where it would be a little bit embarrassing. We might say, "except the right to purchase material to protect any guaranty made and to dispose of the same." That would certainly cover it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The guaranty made under section 14?

Mr. HAMLIN. The guaranty made under section 14, yes.

Mr. WINGO. Let me suggest these words:

Except for the purpose of disposing of any property on hand or necessary to protect the Government in any guaranty under section 14.

Mr. HAMLIN. On property purchased.

Mr. WINGO. Or necessary to protect the Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. Or such acts as are necessary.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is it not safer to put in the affirmative provision, rather than to put in an exception there?

Mr. HAMLIN. I take it we all want to leave in the general provision to compel the closing of contract making after the termination of the war, in so far as it is possible to do so. So I think it is all right to leave this section in, with the exception suggested.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It occurred to me that the provision in lines 22–24 itself might be in conflict with the subsequent provisions of the law authorizing the purchase in order to protect guaranties.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The provision in lines 22 to 24, page 10, is as follows:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize entering into contracts under this act after the termination of the war.

I think the language would more clearly express the intention that was in the minds of the committee if it should read "that nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize entering into executory contracts."

Mr. HAMLIN. If you do that, you are going to get into all sorts of trouble and doubts.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The other section authorizes the purchase of this material after the war—that is, any time during the guarantee.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit, I think the modification suggested by my colleague from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] will clear that up, that after the word "war" insert "except for the purpose of disposing of property on hand or such as may be necessary to protect the Government under guaranties of section 14."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If you ask the owner of property and he says, "I am going to dispose of it," that does not mean that he is going to store it. It means—it is generally understood to mean—that he is going to part with the title. Does not the gentleman think that he ought to provide in the alternative that the Government shall sell, store, or otherwise dispose of the property.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is in the bill. I will call attention to the fact that the first part of section 11 provides for the entering into contracts for necessaries for periods not exceeding two years to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for and to sell necessaries at reasonable prices, and so forth.

Then we put in the proviso that nothing in this act shall be construed to make these contracts after the termination of the war. It occurred to us that they ought to have the right to dispose of the property then on hand.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But suppose it should be for the interest of the Government not to dispose of it, as the word "dispose" is customarily understood, but to store it. The Government might itself want to use it for something else. To "dispose of" means to get rid of. Why not put in the words "sell, store, or otherwise dispose of," because dispose of would not mean to store.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think the Government as a government would have any use for material except to see that it got into the hands of the people who must use it. I do not think we will have any trouble on that line.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There might be a falling market or a rising market or a glutted market, and it might be to the direct interest of the Government to store the necessaries for future use. Whatever is left over it might be to the direct financial interest of the Government to keep.

Mr. HAMLIN. For a time I realize that is true, but I do not think there is much danger of that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There ought not to be any danger at all, and if you can eliminate the danger by the use of proper language why not use it? Why not use the words "sell, store, or otherwise dispose of"?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in the manner which the Clerk will report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 24, after the word "war," insert the following: "except for the purpose of disposing of property on hand or such as may be necessary to protect the Government on its guaranty under section 14."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Missouri will be allowed to modify his amendment as reported.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri by inserting before the word "disposing" in his amendment the words "selling, storing, or otherwise."

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection personally to that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It seems to me that it makes the meaning clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin to the amendment of Mr. HAMLIN: After the word "of" insert "selling, storing, or otherwise," so that the amendment will read "except for the purpose of selling, storing, or otherwise disposing of property on hand or such as may be necessary to protect the Government on its guaranty under section 14."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think it is a mistake to try to put exceptions in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman oppose the amendment to the amendment or the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The perfected amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if the gentleman will suspend, the Chair will put the question on the amendment to the amendment. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I really think that it is a mistake to begin to make exceptions when we are undertaking to state in this bill that it is a war measure and shall end with the war. We have a right to suspect that at the conclusion of the war we will find a pretty extensive Bureau of Mines. We have a right also to expect that that bureau will come to Congress asking for an extension of a great many things that are in here, and we also have a right to expect that if at the conclusion of war that bureau finds itself with metals on hand or contracts on hand or many other things, it will then come to Congress in order to determine the method of closing the contracts, including possibly the selling over a period of time, so as not to destroy the market. I do not believe the amendment of the gentleman adds any particular weight, and it puts us in the position of trying to decide what we will do at the end of the war in a business which we are rearranging completely in this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman, of course, understands that under the provisions of this bill it is possible that the Government may have some minerals on hand at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly, and that is why the Bureau of Mines, or the "Mining Administration," as it is to be called, can come to Congress and find the way of disposing of them. In other places where the Government is in the selling business—the Forestry Service, for instance—there are many restrictions which call for advertising for bids, and so on, and I think we might do well to wait until we reach the time when we are ready to sell on account of the end of the war. I yield the floor.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well, let us take a vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on a matter independent of the pending amendment, I wish to direct the attention of the chairman——

Mr. HAMLIN. Then let us have a vote upon the amendment first.

Mr. STAFFORD. In connection with this amendment I assume then that the President is to have authority to enter into contracts after the termination of the war for the stated purposes included in the exception?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then my original inquiry was along the same line. In the fourth line of the section authority is given to the Secretary of the Interior to enter into contracts for necessaries for periods not exceeding two years. I assume he has that authority to enter into those contracts regardless of whether the war continues or not.

Mr. FOSTER. No; that is up to the time the war is closed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The language does not so state.

That the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is authorized from time to time to use the funds provided under section 18 to enter into contracts for necessaries for periods of not exceeding two years.

Mr. FOSTER. But in other parts of the bill it says no contracts shall be entered into for this purpose after the war is ended.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is further limited by the following language:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize entering into contracts under this act after the termination of the war.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the President may have authority at any time under this present section to enter into contracts for periods of two years, before the termination of the war. The tenure of the contract is two years.

Mr. FOSTER. Not to exceed two years. Of course, they can ke it for two years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Following that language, we find that the President is given further power to purchase, store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell necessaries at reasonable prices to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior. Has not the President the right to enter into contracts for a period of two years under the prior clause to purchase these necessaries?

Mr. FOSTER. To purchase these necessaries for two years?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; for a period of two years.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purpose of limiting, as the paragraph does, the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to enter into contracts for necessaries for periods of not exceeding two years by the further language to purchase, store and provide storage facilities for, and to sell necessaries at reasonable prices to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior? The language is rather ambiguous in its meaning as to just what the committee intends by those two respective clauses.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee understands what it is trying to express, and that is that the President should have the right, through the Secretary of the Interior, to purchase these articles, making contracts to purchase them for a period not exceeding two years before the war closes, and he has the right under that provision to store and to provide storage facilities, which he would have to do if he is going to store, and then to sell the necessaries—dispose of them at a reasonable price. He can make those contracts not to exceed two years.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Would not these latter powers be limited by the life of the act? It looks to me as though you had given the President authority to enter into contracts for necessaries, which, I assume, carries the power to enter into contracts for the purchase of the various commodities named in the bill for a period not exceeding two years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Then you go on in the next clause and authorize the President to purchase necessities and to exercise powers—other powers—but it would seem to me that by the language that subsequent power was limited by the life of the act, notwithstanding he had power to enter into contracts for the purchase of necessaries which might extend for two years.

Mr. FOSTER. These suggestions, I will say to the gentleman, are what the Government may do in reference to buying and selling and storage of these necessaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit? Are these the only powers that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to exercise under the general head of entering into contracts for necessaries?

Mr. FOSTER. Under this section, yes, as I understand.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the language definitive of the general authority and, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine, coextensive? One is very general authority of the broadest character and the other is delimiting; although it does not so state, it is delimiting.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, in reply——

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I say a word in reply to the query propounded by my colleague [Mr. STAFFORD]? It seems to me the meaning of the section is plain as it is written. Line 13 in the first clause authorizes the President to enter into contract for necessaries for a period not exceeding two years. For instance, he could enter into a contract to-day for goods—necessaries—to be manufactured and delivered at any time within two years from this date. Then he is next given power, line 15, to purchase, store, and provide. He can take money and buy necessaries already manufactured and in existence. They are two separate and distinct powers, one supplementary to the other. He could not make a contract for the manufacture of the necessaries, and so forth, or for the bringing of them here without having the contract specify some time for their delivery. Under the language of the law, if this becomes a law, the time of delivery must be within two years from the date of the contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. My colleague will understand when the goods are purchased he enters into a contract——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not necessarily. He can send out——

Mr. STAFFORD. Quite necessarily.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He can take the cash right at hand, the money, and buy these necessaries and have the property delivered and take a receipt for the payment. He would not have to wait until——

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the way the President or the Secretary of the Interior would proceed under the powers vested in him by this act.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think that the executive officials of the Government very frequently go out and make purchases for cash in these times, hand over the money, and get a receipt for the payment.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, there are laws which forbid any department official going out into the market and purchasing supplies for the Government without first calling for bids.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We have made lump-sum appropriations since this war began and purchases have been made in just the way I described, and the President has made purchases under the $100,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have made lump-sum appropriations, but the general statute saying how this authority should be exercised still pertains.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe there is any trouble about this.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of section 11, line 24, the balance of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 24, beginning with the word "any," strike out all down to and including the word "receipt," line 6, page 11.

Mr. CANNON. Now, will the Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out?

The Clerk read as follows:

Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal by the United States of necessaries under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, section 12 provides for the use of $50,000,000 for this purpose, or as much as may be necessary. Now, the query is, What is the use, without stronger reasons than I can conceive, of authorizing the use of this $50,000,000 for such purpose as a revolving fund? Congress is almost continuously in session. The appropriation is to follow, and whether the authorization is five millions or ten millions or fifty millions, as Congress may determine, it can be used as a revolving fund. I do not see the necessity for the revolving fund.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. If they do not have the revolving fund to use for this purchase and sale, if this were stricken out, then, if they made a purchase and sale, the proceeds of that sale would be covered into the Treasury, under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And it would take a special appropriation act to use it?

Mr. FOSTER. It would take another appropriation to pay back the funds.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it ought to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. It would take a pretty large fund.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will pardon me.

I want to state here and now that there is but one possible excuse for this legislation, and that is manganese.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think so at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the record shows quite differently.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have read the record, and read it very carefully.

Now, then, take manganese. You are going to buy it for a minimum price in order to encourage the little fellows to go out now and develop new sources of supply, when, at the same time, you have got to depend upon the large development that we now have, and which is possible, with ample capital, and that large development, of the 240,000 tons to be delivered this year, with 6,000 per cent of increase in manganese in five years, produced largely, as I understand it, by the Butte Co. in Montana. That company is headed by Mr. Ryan, is it not?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; they can produce it there if they put in the machinery.

Mr. CANNON. And the newspapers say he is going to put in $1,500,000 in machinery. Mr. Ryan goes at the head of another important branch of the service—the Aviation Section—and I am exceedingly glad that he does.

Now, what does it require for a small development? Machinery, work, and to get that slight development in the presence of this large capital the guaranty of the minimum price is given, and that goes to Mr. Ryan's product. Well, now then, with that in sight, and with the poor fellow tramping through the forest, digging for the mineral, and begging for transportation over the railroads, if he has a little money and wants to get some machinery, he must have priority for the machinery, when there is this great use for shipbuilding and for munitions and for everything else. Priority is to be given to the little fellow, who is to be patted on the back, you know, but his product, small in amount, would only be useful to the large producer, who would get the same increase in price as the small producer gets, when without a guaranty the demand for manganese in five years has increased the output to 6,000 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Now, what nonsense——

Mr. HAMLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. I will be glad to answer, if I can.

Mr. HAMLIN. If we do not have a revolving fund, and it becomes necessary for the Government to buy some of this material in order to keep our munition plants running, and we go and buy it and sell it to them, we must take that money and put it in the Treasury. And then it may become necessary next day for them to buy some more, and Congress may not be in session, and it may take a little time to get appropriations through. Would you stop the manufacture of war materials?

Mr. CANNON. It would not require this time as to the munitions people and the shipbuilding people. They can do it direct. And I am here to say that I am satisfied, and for that reason I am moving to strike this out, that the price of manganese—and about 700,000 tons, I believe, will be required, according to the——

Mr. HAMLIN. Eight hundred thousand.

Mr. CANNON. Or 800,000 tons, whatever it is, which has been multiplied 6,000 per cent, and is produced very largely by the capitalists with plants that can command transportation. And the price of manganese is sufficient, if it has been increased in five years 6,000 per cent, to bring the manganese. And what we can not get in that way we bring from Brazil.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman from Illinois observed that the language in line 12 is that this is to be used as a revolving fund "in the discretion of the President"?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the discretion of the President! All is in the discretion of the President! Your President and mine controls the various departments and the various war measures. I do not believe it is wise to make this revolving fund.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that under this bill the Government is, in a way, going into business, or, in other words, it is establishing a business concern in mining and operating of mines and guaranteeing a certain amount of capital to keep up the prices, and so forth? Now, if that $50,000,000 is the capital stock, and it is lost, of course that ends the matter; but suppose in the management of this business they sell the product, bring the money back, and it goes into this revolving fund, it is in the Treasury of the United States and the people are just as well off as they would be if it went into the Treasury direct, with this, perhaps, one exception, that if we do not have the revolving fund, then you have got to vote some more capital direct, and I can not see any objection to this. And I wish my colleague would point out more clearly his objection to the revolving fund.

Mr. CANNON. Great heavens! The revolving fund! We have got ample discretion, in my judgment, now. This does not capitalize anybody. This places a bounty. You can not spend a dollar of this to capitalize a manganese factory. But you can put a bounty on the factory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I just wanted to show this authority. I think I have got it here.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, can I have more time?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mind you, this brings in the Interior Department. I can tell you who can capitalize these people, if necessary. The Council of National Defense, with Mr. Baruch at the head of it, I believe; the War Board organization; the War Finance organization, with the $500,000,000 that has just been authorized to be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury. They can do the financing. Let me read you; I did not read it the other day.

Now, listen. I read: "You do not mean financial assistance," said the gentleman from Missouri to the Secretary of the Interior. Oh, no; he is just going to fix the guaranty.

Secretary LANE. I think he—

The man who is going to make the manganese—

I think he can get his financial assistance from this new financial scheme that you gentlemen have passed giving the Treasury Department that power, or that we may contract with him through the War Industries Board or some other means by which he will be guaranteed a certain price for a certain amount of his product.

Now, who produces the 240,000 tons?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman from Illinois failed to apprehend fully the statement of his colleague [Mr. MCKENZIE]. It is not the intention or purpose of this bill for the Government to finance a single one of these concerns directly—not one. We will say to this man with a small mine, "We will guarantee, if you will produce the ore for a certain period of two years, that you will not receive less than so much per ton for the product. We are going to guarantee that you will get on the market not less than so much." Now, the Government needs the capital for itself to make good the guaranty. That is the capital he is talking about.

Mr. CANNON. It may be the capital he is talking about, but it is not the capital the Secretary of the Interior is talking about. You must guarantee the Butte Co., of Montana, for its large output when you guarantee the small producer, and your bill does so; and yet the large producer in five years has increased his output 6,000 per cent. The effect of this bill, if enacted, will be to use the small producer to increase the price of the large producer.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Secretary of the Interior said the miners could go to the Finance Corporation and make a loan. We are not asking to give them a single dollar.

Mr. CANNON. The little fellow that has to be engaged—he is not now producing; he has not the capital to produce. When you guarantee a minimum price for the manganese, does he go to Mr. Ryan? Does not that guaranty go to everybody who is producing?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Absolutely so; and the price has hastened this production, this 6,000 per cent in the last few years.

Now, what is the use in falling over ourselves and enacting legislation that is not necessary and which may lead, not dishonestly but from mistaken action, to great scandal and great abuse?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. If I understand the question just asked by the gentleman, under the terms of this bill the Government does not enter into a contract for the production of a commodity.

Mr. CANNON. It can.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. It can; but unless the man voluntarily makes the contract, there is nothing in this proposed statute which compels him to enter into that contract.

Mr. CANNON. No; you can not mandamus a man to make him contract.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. No. But let me ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Even with this bonus which it is proposed to give under the terms of this bill, will that of itself stimulate production, or will it result possibly the same as the bonus that was given on wheat? The farmer to-day says, by allowing us $2.20 a bushel on wheat, instead of encouraging us, you have reduced the price of it, holding us down. We could have got $3 if you had not put us down to $2.20. What does the gentleman think of that?

Mr. CANNON. That is speculation. I do not believe in interfering with the law of supply and demand until it is absolutely necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. If I may be allowed another minute——

Mr. GARLAND. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. GARLAND. I notice you concede that the production has increased very largely?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; 6,000 per cent.

Mr. GARLAND. Do you recognize that the importation has increased also?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. GARLAND. Showing a greater consumption.

Mr. CANNON. It has not increased in proportion.

Mr. GARLAND. From 1908, 108,000 long tons, to 1917, 620,000 long tons.

Mr. CANNON. Two hundred and forty thousand tons, with little increase of its use, is produced in the United States.

Mr. GARLAND. Does it not naturally follow, under the gentleman's plan of reasoning, that this great increase of production will call for increasing imports? Does not the additional increase show that there is need of more of it?

Mr. CANNON. The price has increased also.

Mr. GARLAND. The quantity is what we are speaking of. Quantity is the necessity. We only fix the price in order to get the quantity.

Mr. CANNON. I know; but in my judgment there is nothing about this bill that has a plausible argument for it except manganese.

Mr. GARLAND. I am talking about manganese now.

Mr. CANNON. They are talking about pyrites, and all that kind of thing. We are exporting sulphur, which is just as good as pyrites for sulphuric acid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate, of course, the force of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said, but still I think that the point made by his colleague [Mr. MCKENZIE] is unanswerable. The thing now paramount in the mind of every loyal American is the winning of this war, and this is one of the bills whose primary purpose is to confer upon the Government such authority as that it will be independent of private manipulation or control when necessary to secure supplies of things essential to the prosecution of the war.

If the owners of these very valuable minerals or of the lands on which they are located do not voluntarily enter into contracts to supply the Government, the Government has the power under a subsequent section to acquire the lands, smelters, and other properties, whether the owners are willing or not. But the provision which we are now discussing relates entirely to a situation where the contracts are voluntary. The $50,000,000 revolving fund is to be used in that connection. In my judgment the point raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is, as I have already said, unanswerable. If this money is used to buy necessaries—the $50,000,000 or any portion of it—and for some reason the Government does not wish to use all those necessaries at that particular time, but does wish to dispose of them in a particular way for money, and it gets the money into its possession, it ought to have the right to use that sum of money for the same purpose for which the original appropriation was made.

In other words, it ought to go into the revolving fund for carrying out the purposes of that section, the voluntary contract section plan, and not for the forcible taking of property. Therefore, with all respect to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I think that his amendment ought not to pass.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to close debate on this. How much time does the gentleman from Wisconsin want?

Mr. STAFFORD. Ten or fifteen minutes. I want to speak along the general lines of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not take it on the next section?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not spoken so far.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to say that we must finish the bill to-day, and I propose to keep the committee in session, if I can, until 10 o'clock to-night, if necessary. I think nobody ought to complain that I have not been liberal in the matter of debate.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has been very liberal, but my friend should recollect that "must" is for the king. The gentleman said "must."

Mr. FOSTER. I will modify that, and say that I would very much like to finish the bill to-day.

Mr. CANNON. I know that is what my friend means.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me make a suggestion. As section 14 is the main section in this whole business, the meat of the whole thing, why can we not proceed with the reading of the bill until we reach that section?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to offer a little amendment to section 12.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is all right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And I want to discuss it, because it deals with the right of one department of the Government to go into another department and take the Government's own property. We have had to provide for that in the case of taking timber, and I think it is necessary with regard to this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSTER. How much time does the gentleman from Wisconsin want?

Mr. STAFFORD. Ten or fifteen minutes. Let me proceed. I shall not take up much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the debate has proceeded thus far in justification of this very exceptional bill—which in its provisions is founded almost word for word upon the authority conferred in the food-control act—on the idea that because there is need in this country for one character of minerals, therefore we are justified in vesting the Bureau of Mines with authority to develop mines of all characters in the production of the various minerals that are enumerated in the catalogue. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said, there is but one main mineral which has been instanced in justification of this bill, and that is manganese. As far as many of the others are concerned, not even the shipping industry can be used as an argument why this bill should be passed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] on Saturday said that this bill means the relieving of the shipping situation. I deny it. Certainly we do not mean to say that the ships that are used in the transportation of antimony from China will not continue to be used in the same trade. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY]—protectionist that he is, and desirous of giving perhaps every industry in the country all the materials that are necessary in the manufacture of its products of home production—go to the extent of having hothouse production of tea, so as to relieve the ships on the Pacific from transporting it from China? Further, as to the transportation of manganese from Brazil, is it intended that we are going to discontinue the ships that go to South American countries? Are we going to enter into that character of trade prohibition whereby we are going to say "no" to our South American allies, and say to them, "We will not purchase your needed raw materials and we will not use the ships for the return cargo in the shipment of your ferromanganese, but intend to develop mines at home that have been unproductive and unprofitable heretofore in the manufacture of ferromanganese"? No manufacturer of steel in this country has been protesting at the lack of ferromanganese in the manufacture of necessary steel in meeting the needs of the Government.

I have a slight acquaintance with the steel industry. True, the price of manganese went mountain high shortly after the outbreak of the war; but the price has been falling since, and it has fluctuated, and now because there may be pointed out cases where ships are needed in the transportation of antimony from China or manganese from Brazil to this country, or pyrites from Spain, are you going to justify the Bureau of Mines in launching into an unheard-of venture to develop unprofitable mines? And how? By guaranteeing a price. And who is to pay that price? The American people are going to pay that price. Manufacturers are going to get the benefit of the minerals at the market price, but the difference between the market price and the guaranteed price, under this artificial control by the Government that is proposed in this bill, will be paid by the Government. And who is the Government? The people of the United States. Do you mean to say that your constituents are going to approve of a policy some years ago advocated only in that little narrow district around Boston, known as the Home Market Club, of producing everything that the home market demanded?

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he has any apprehension that it is among the possibilities that our shipping connections with South America might be cut off.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no apprehension whatever as to the shipping facilities with South America, China, or Japan. I am not basing legislation in Congress on fear. I do not believe that we are warranted in going to the extreme, departing from the established principles of our Government, in advocating Government guaranty of price and the development of unprofitable mines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman has answered my first question, and now I put the second one. If the gentleman did have any apprehension that it was possible that we might find ourselves shut off from the over-sea production of manganese, would he favor this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not, because the testimony shows that we can produce it without aid from the Government, and we are going ahead to meet that condition. Why are we meeting that condition? Anyone acquainted with the steel industry knows the price of manganese has advanced, and that they can go ahead and manufacture ferromanganese from products of the mines that have heretofore been wasted. The testimony shows that the production of ferromanganese in this country has risen 600 per cent. Shortly after the European war began and when the United States began to furnish large supplies of munitions to the allies there has been a greater demand for ferromanganese, but for six or eight years prior to that time the importations were virtually stationary.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman appreciates how difficult it may be for any company to secure finances to develop a new mining proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly; it is most difficult to secure money to float any proposition of a chimerical character. There is no difficulty for any person or any business concern that has men at the head of it of known standing to secure money to extend its production. The Dodge Bros., for instance, of Detroit, are erecting a large Government plant, partly by the aid of Government money, but mainly on the tremendous basis of their own credit, involving the expenditure of millions and millions. Why? Because the Dodge Bros. are men of known credit and can get money for the establishment of any new industry.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield to me to state a concrete proposition?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I know where there is a mine of ferromanganese——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I know where there are several.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. So do I, but this one in particular contains iron and manganese together, which is a valuable mineral. It is not valuable either for mineral or manganese at the former price. But at the price the manganese is now selling I think it is a valuable proposition commercially. The Government has got to have manganese. It is owned by a corporation of what we call smaller individuals, just business men. They absolutely can not get a dollar to develop that mine. Is it not advisable that the Government should take that mine and go ahead and develop it?

Mr STAFFORD. No; there is no need of it for, as far as ferromanganese is concerned, it can be obtained from other quarters.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It can not.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is being obtained from South America. What justification can there be for the Government going into the mining proposition on 50 articles, some of which can be obtained freely, like cobalt from Canada, or arsenic from Canada, which furnishes 90 per cent, or antimony from China, which furnishes 87 per cent; and I could go on with other articles? What justification is there for the Government launching into the policy of developing mines of such minerals when they can be obtained in ample quantity in the usual course of trade?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can answer the gentleman in one sentence. We can not obtain them in the course of trade, because the shipping all over the world has been cut off.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no contention that there is not free communication between this country and Canada in the way of obtaining mineral supplies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand the gentleman's answer to the gentleman from Minnesota, it is that he believes that men of recognized standing in the financial world who have enterprises which they can demonstrate are good enterprises, can get capital in these times. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that we are not going to get these supplies from abroad because of the lack of shipping, and to increase production we must go into the mines which have not been working, and men must go into them under the stress of war conditions, and so must have the help which this bill supplies?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have a general idea of the way abandoned mines in the Galena district in my State which had been abandoned for years and years in the production of zinc and lead, because the price was not alluring, were operated by reason of the price going up. As far as the gentleman's position is concerned, gentlemen who have credit, as the late James J. Hill stated, can obtain money to develop anything. Mr. Ryan today is going ahead and developing ferromanganese because the price warrants it, and wherever the price warrants it production will follow.

But the Government nowhere is claiming that there is any lack of ferromanganese in the United States to manufacture Government supplies. Mr. Chairman, under the guise of war necessity they are advocating that this bill be passed, when they know if it is passed, and the Government lends its support by guaranteeing the price and authorizing the President to levy a tariff on these articles to protect that guaranty, it will take a year or more—two years—before the necessary supplies of these articles can be produced here at home, and in the meantime ships will be continuously employed in such transportation. Ought we not to have our shipping increased to the extent of the same amount of money that will be sunk by this bill, if it is a shipping question, which I question, rather than to have it sunk in unproductive mines, against all principles of business and good economics?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And is it not quite probable that as we go into the development, both in a Government way and in an additional way, on account of the increased price, we will come to a time where we will have to warn the public to look out for the difference between a Government guaranteed mine and an old dead boy that has been brought up, resurrected, and offered to the public, and in which the public will sink millions of dollars?

Mr. STAFFORD. As the gentleman suggested the other day, every mining proposition that has been regarded as a dead loss for years and years—properties in which your father and my father invested money—will be resurrected and their stock again put on the market, and that will be used as a warrant for the Government going into the production of minerals—50 articles—where there is no limitation whatever upon transportation facilities to furnish those necessary supplies here. Who says that there is any lack of transportation facilities in obtaining supplies from Canada? Is it the idea of this bill to erect a Chinese wall in these times when it is necessary for the Government to secure supplies from everywhere in the world, and have the Government go into the mining business, the business of developing this prospector's proposition and that prospector's proposition?

No one can justify the hothouse production of minerals or any other commodity, especially in these war times, when we need all the money, not for wasteful extravagance in sinking and developing needless mines, based upon the recommendation of some theoretical professor or some State geologist, but in useful pursuits to carry out the real war needs of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, can the gentleman not wait a moment or two?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, we have been debating this for an hour and we must proceed. The gentleman can get in on something else.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON) there were—ayes 7, noes 18.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That whenever the President shall find it essential to the successful prosecution of the war to secure an adequate supply of necessaries he is authorized, through the Secretary of the Interior, to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any undeveloped, insufficiently developed or operated, or idle mineral land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant and to develop, operate, or cause the same to be developed or operated in such manner and through such agency as he may direct. Whenever the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such mineral land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, is not essential for the successful prosecution of the war the same shall be restored to the person entitled to the possession thereof. The United States shall make just compensation, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, approved by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, and operation by the Government of any such mineral land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof. If the compensation so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code. Compensation provided for in this section shall be paid from the appropriation made by section 18 of this act. The Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for carrying out the purposes of this section, including the operation of any such mineral land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, the purchase, sale, or other disposition of articles used, manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined therein, and the employment, control, and compensation of employees. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the use or operation of any such mineral land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for the purpose of the continued use or operation of any such mineral land or deposit, mine, smelter, plant, or part thereof, and the accounts of each such mineral land or deposit, mine, smelter, plant, or part thereof, shall be kept separate and distinct. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, in line 9, page 12, the word "judicial" is incorrectly spelled, and in line 13 the word "essential" is incorrectly spelled. I ask unanimous consent that those words be correctly spelled.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be made, as indicated.

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Is not this the section that enables the Secretary of the Interior to seize these mines and run them and pay for them?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; it does.

Mr. CANNON. Then this does do more than guarantee the price?

Mr. FOSTER. It is section 14 more particularly that does that; but I hope that we can get along with this a little faster.

Mr. CANNON. If we had a full committee here we might. I doubt if a majority of the committee, if it was all here, would understand this, for I doubt that more than a few of them have read this bill. Does my friend think they have?

Mr. FOSTER. I can not tell, but I would not like to say that they have not, because I do not believe Members would legislate without reading the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, doubting Thomas!

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will not the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment so that we can make this reach the public domain?

Mr. FOSTER. Is there objection to my request?

Mr. CANNON. I think we better go on for a little while more. Perhaps we will have some more vacant seats if we proceed a little while.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I withdraw the request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, and I shall read it for the information of the chairman of the committee. I desire to move to amend section 12, after line 15, embracing in my amendment the same words that have been added to the Agricultural bill to enable the War Department to go into the forest reserves to secure timber. It is possible that the first 10 lines of this section now authorize that to be done in the case of minerals in the reserves. But perhaps not; and I propose to make sure by using exactly the same words that were prepared in the Senate after we had amended the last Agricultural bill and had found some difficulty in finding exactly the right phraseology. The words are these:

That hereafter, during the existing state of war, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, under regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the War Department—

I change that to the Interior Department—or any other department, board, or commission of the Government, to take from the national forest such minerals—

I change it to minerals instead of timber—

as may be needed in the prosecution of the war.

I see no reason why such amendment should not go in. The point is here. I am not fully familiar with the procedure by which citizens are permitted to develop mineral prospects in the forest reserves. There are restrictions, I know. There has never been any occasion for the Government to sell minerals from the reserves, but in the selling of timber there had to be advertising and other delaying steps, which we eliminated for the time of the war by the words quoted. If other sections are like the district which I have the honor to represent, there is lots of manganese in the forest reserves that has not been developed, because mining has been discouraged under the existing policy.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman doubtless is very familiar with this——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Pardon me. I am not so familiar with mining privileges in the forest reserves.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the present status in relation to these forest reserves, so far as permitting private individuals to go in these reserves and mine? Is there any law permitting that now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, I think so; but under restrictions such as to amount almost to prohibition. In the West we have forest reserves which embrace mountains containing minerals, and the protection of the reserves has served in a way to repress and stop prospecting and mining also. Men there are writing to me all the time desiring to go into reserves to develop something they claim to have discovered in the early days.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hardly think the gentleman's suggestion would be sufficient unless we have a general law or such law permitting mining on these reserves.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We are allowing the Secretary of Agriculture to permit any department to go into the forest reserves, which means that part of the public domain in the reserves, and take anything needed for war purposes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly; but the Government is not proposing in this bill to go into the mining business.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a brief statement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If I am incorrect, I hope somebody will put me right. Some years ago, having in mind this exact matter of the development of the mineral deposits on forest reserves, I prepared and introduced a bill providing for a system under which an individual could go and prospect and if successful could take a lease, royalty should be taxed, and so forth. I had several conversations with Mr. Pinchot, then in charge of the Forestry Division, and he told me that he rather favored, not the exact terms of the bill, but the general program. I thought I was getting along beautifully with it for about a year or two, until we suddenly came to a stop, and here was the stop: He wanted the revenues of the mining to go into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That has been one of the troubles.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He said they would have to go into the forest-reserve fund to be used for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So as to make a good showing for the reserves.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And that is where I understand the matter ended. I do not think it has ever gone further; if it has, I would like to be advised.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have no doubt the amendment I propose could be inserted as a separate paragraph anywhere in the bill, and I would be glad to withhold it; then secure further information and advise the gentleman. Of course everybody knows the Forest Service is expected to make a showing sufficient to justify its getting the large appropriations it has received from year to year, but the resources in the forest reserves belong to the Government, and some of them have been for sale. All of these resources should be available for war purposes without strings of any kind.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman conceive of any reason why the Forestry Service should carry on a mining operation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; except for carrying on this war. The Government admits prospecting under certain restrictions.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Should the Government have the revenues from the mines?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, I have always thought not. It is stopping development, of course. It discourages prospecting. Prospects are undeveloped, one of the reasons which seem to make necessary a bill of this kind. However, if the Government gets behind, in general terms, the mining business——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. FESS. The answer of the gentleman from Missouri to the gentleman's question that the Government was not going into the mining business—I would like to know the full force of this language——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion of this language:

That whenever the President shall find it essential to the successful prosecution of the war to secure an adequate supply of necessaries he is authorized, through the Secretary of the Interior, to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any undeveloped, insufficiently developed or operated, or idle mineral land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant and to develop, operate, or cause the same to be developed or operated in such manner and through such agency as he may direct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is due to a war exigency, and that is the one clause in the bill that gives me a reason for supporting the bill. If we have got minerals in our forest reserves that are needed for the prosecution of the war, for heaven's sake let us go and get them. The Government might as well go after the minerals as to go after the aeroplane spruce stock in the forest reserves. Or go after anything else that it needs for war purposes. I thought we had given that power long ago. The people want the President to take anything needed for the Army and Navy. Of course, this bill undertakes general mining development on the side, and there is where the troubles come in.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I ought to be permitted to say that in answering the question of the gentleman from Washington perhaps I made it a little too broad a statement without any qualifications. What I meant to say was this: That it was not the intention of this bill of putting the Government in the mining business at all, and under these conditions mentioned here which the gentleman has just read, in case there would be somebody who had a mine but for some reason would not develop it, then the Government, if it needed the mineral that would come from that mine, would have the right to go in there and take possession of it and operate it. But we are not expecting that that condition will arise at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We are having that same trouble in the spruce industry right here. The nonresident owner does not make the spruce available.

Mr. FESS. I do not see any limitation in this section against the Government going into the mining business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If that is the case, then is it not just as well to have a provision here so that we shall not be in danger of any one department of the Government falling into a controversy with another department as to what that department shall be paid?

It is difficult to coordinate the three branches of the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not my colleague believe that even without this language the Government would have this power?

Mr. FESS. I rather think so.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Suppose the forest reserve should say: "We must be paid just as we were paid before for timber"?

Mr. ANDERSON. It only takes it out of one pocket and puts it into another.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But when you come to bids and other things, lots of time is lost.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say frankly that I have no objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington offers the following amendment: Page 11, line 15, after the word "direct," insert the following: "That hereafter during the existing state of war the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, under regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the Interior Department, or any other department, board, or commission of the Government to take from the national forests such minerals as may be needed in the prosecution of the war."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will just say, if the gentleman will permit one question, that I think the gentleman's amendment is absolutely unnecessary, and I will call his attention to the language.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is possible it may be, but it can not do any harm.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The language is to authorize him "to requisition and take over."

"Requisition and take over" would imply ownership by somebody else and not by the Government, and your language covers Government land.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Covers land in conservation, that is laid aside for posterity and for the purpose of future resources.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And not the public land?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The reservation, and the exact word I had in mind is the word "take." That is, take without payment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I want to know if we can not agree on time to close debate on this section.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like a little time along here somewhere.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], too. And I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have only two verbal corrections to make. But perhaps they have been corrected before.

Mr. STAFFORD. They have been corrected.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then that is all right.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think it is possible the members of the committee do not fully understand the importance of manganese in connection with the shipping problem. We are now importing over half a million tons annually of ferromanganese and manganese ore. The greater portion of this comes from Brazil, a little from Cuba, and a little from India, though how it is brought from there now is more than I can understand, yet the export record so shows. And it also comes from some other countries. In order to carry a half million tons annually it requires a large amount of shipping. The most of this manganese is imported in the form of ore, I suppose, because facilities for smelting are insufficient in Brazil. It makes a very bulky article, and it is obvious that there must be a considerable difficulty in getting it at a time like this. Gentlemen will remember that a short time ago we noted in the newspapers that the collier Cyclops had probably been lost at sea, and also that this collier was loaded with manganese. I assume the collier was taken for this purpose on account of the difficulty in getting in communication with Brazil. We had, so far as I knew last, no regular steamship line to Brazil. The exports from Brazil mostly go to England or to continental Europe, and then come back over here by an extremely roundabout way. If we are to get this manganese from Brazil, it will necessitate that we put on ships, which, for the most part, would carry but little in going to Brazil and be loaded with this kind of cargo coming back. It is not necessary for me to say to the House that at this time the great problem in this war is the problem of ships and more ships, and the reason for the crisis that is now upon us is because of the lack of ships to transport troops, munitions, and supplies to Europe. Anything that we can possibly do that would tend to help out the ship situation ought to be done at this time.

The problem in connection with manganese is highly important in that direction. I do not know just how many ships will be required to transport this—half a million tons annually are imported—but it certainly will require a large quantity of shipping which ought not to be used in that manner.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The Secretary of the Interior estimates it will take two and one-half million tons of shipping and five tons of shipping to each ton of ore imported. That will be found in his testimony.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there is warrant for our authorizing the Government to develop ferromanganese and fix the price of the commodity, and the like, what warrant is there for the Government going into these "57 other varieties," where there is no pressing need on account of shipping facilities?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Wisconsin can have no controversy with me over that question. I do not think it is necessary to include all the minerals mentioned. Some of them have little or no connection with war operations.

Mr. HAMLIN. Just a minute. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the testimony of Mr. Leith, of the Shipping Board, on page 45. He knows what he is talking about. He says:

Mr. LEITH. We haven't finished our entire list in detail, but we have gone over in detail a considerable number of minerals and made an approximation for the remainder, and I will say that in the list of 45 mineral commodities we estimate a saving of slightly less than 2,000,000 tons of minerals carried, which reduced to deadweight tons, reduced to a factor which recognizes the space minerals occupy for the distance, will amount to a saving of 300,000 to 400,000 deadweight tons.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose that he refers to the one article of ferromanganese?

Mr. HAMLIN. No; that is not the only article.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is not anywhere near that much ferromanganese imported, even including the ore.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask, if the gentleman will permit, What warrant is there for the Government going into the mining business of producing cobalt when we get all our supply from Canada, or mica, when we get 90 per cent of our supply from Canada?

Mr. HAMLIN. There may not be any at all.

Mr. FOSTER. We want to control imports as they come in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Iowa may have the time that the gentleman from Wisconsin was allowed but did not take. I wish to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Wisconsin never seems to have conceived of the purposes of this bill, and I say it respectfully.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; he has not conceived of all the purposes. It is impossible to conceive of all.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman has looked mainly for things to criticize, not for things to approve.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have looked over the bill to find things to approve, so that I could support it, but I see so many objectionable features in it that I can not approve it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Production is not the only feature of this bill. It covers the question of distribution and also control. Take cobalt: It is a necessity, and it is shipped in here; but we ought not to let one concern take it all, to the detriment of a competitor.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, this bill is not framed to cover that purpose.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, yes; it does that very thing.

Mr. FOSTER. It will give the Government control.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is just trying to point out one good feature in order to cover up a dozen nefarious features.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman always knows what he is talking about.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman has not the facts behind him.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has the facts. The committee has no facts at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have always favored the production of ferromanganese in this country. When the last tariff bill was up for consideration I was opposed to taking off the duty of $2.50 per ton on that mineral. If the duty had been retained as I then urged, I think we would now have no occasion to be using our shipping in this way. Now the condition confronts us that we have to import half a million tons annually. It is not possible now to relieve the situation by any tariff rate. The only way of encouraging production is through some such method as is suggested by this bill, although I would prefer that the method was made more definite and specific than it is, instead of being so framed that it is almost impossible for anyone to tell just exactly what is intended to be done. But in any event we must have the minerals for war purposes. We must relieve our ships, if possible. For that reason I shall support the bill with such amendments as can be obtained to make it more specific.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion as a lawyer on this point.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will try to give it to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. In line, section 12, page 11, is the word "necessaries," which is defined in the first article of the bill as pertaining to the items enumerated. Now, in looking over these items on page 2, I count 39 specifically stated, and then a blanket statement in line 8, "and other rare and unusual elements the supply of which may in the judgment of the President be inadequate" and so on. How broad is that—"and other rare and unusual elements"?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It would be impossible for anyone to define it. I assume that is the answer that my friend expected me to make. You can not tell the limits of it.

Mr. FESS. Then there is no limit as to what the Government may do under this bill as to the number of items to be produced?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Provided they are classed as "rare."

Mr. LONGWORTH. If my colleague will pardon me, this includes "chemical compounds" of those things. There may be a million things.

Mr. FESS. I noticed that. I noticed also that my colleague attempted to omit that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I only did it on the assurance of the committee.

Mr. FESS. You propose here a penalty of $5,000 or imprisonment for two years, or both, for the willful destruction of these necessaries, and some of the necessaries are not named in the bill. Is that the usual method of drafting a statute?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. Such a form as that was never heard of, I think, until the bill at the present time. I do not approve it. My recollection is that it was sought to amend the bill in these respects, but the amendments failed.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not think, if the gentleman please, that you could be punished for destroying anything except an article that was enumerated. I think the construction of the law would be that it would hold good as to those things enumerated, but you could not possibly punish a man as to articles not enumerated.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Take, for example, sulphuric acid. If anybody destroyed sulphuric acid he would be punished under this bill, yet sulphuric acid is not mentioned.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not approve the indefinite language of the bill, but I think it very doubtful whether conviction could be legally had for the destruction of an article not enumerated. In criminal law nothing is left to implication, and that construction is always given to the law which is most favorable to the defendant. It should be borne in mind also that the acts penalized must, under the terms of the bill, be willful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HELM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. HELM. To strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That whenever the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations, to be approved by the President, governing, or may either or wholly or partly prohibit, such operations, practices, and transactions as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices. Such regulations may require all persons coming within their provisions to keep such records and statements of account, and may require such persons to make such returns, verified under oath or otherwise, as will fully and correctly disclose all transactions, including the making, execution, settlement, and fulfillment thereof. He may appoint agents to conduct the investigations necessary to enforce the provisions of this section and all rules and regulations made by him in pursuance thereof, and may fix and pay the compensation of such agents. Any person who willfully violates any regulation made pursuant to this section, or who knowingly engages in any operation, practice, or transaction prohibited pursuant to this section, or who willfully aids or abets any such violation or any such prohibited operation, practice, or transaction, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than four years, or both.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, in line 8, page 13, there is a misprint. The word "of" is spelled "rf." I ask that that typographical error be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction indicated will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am going to move to strike out the section, and I want to be heard on that.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I will withhold my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I confess a very strong partiality and leaning toward the gentlemen managing this bill, and I would like to vote for the bill if I can see my way clear to do so. At present I am somewhat confused, and I would like to have the chairman of the committee or some one else give me just as much information on it as he possibly can.

The Standard Oil Co. is perhaps the biggest business going concern in the United States. It often operates through a number of subsidiary corporations. I suppose the Steel Trust is the next largest business going concern in the United States, and I suppose it operates in a manner similar to the methods of the Standard Oil Co. Now, if I understand the uses to which the funds provided for in this bill may be put, and I take it that the most of these minerals are used in greater or less volume by what is commonly called the United States Steel Corporation, is it possible that the United States Steel Corporation can organize subsidiary corporations, weak in themselves, to go out and prospect for minerals, and if they find a prospect for some mineral, can one of these subsidiary organizations of the Steel Corporation come back to the Bureau of Mines and secure funds with which to operate that prospect?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all—not a dollar.

Mr. HELM. I have gotten it into my head in some way that this fund could be used in that way.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not provided that they can use one cent to put into mining unless the Government does the mining itself.

Mr. HELM. Has it not been developed here in the debate that when a concern needs money with which to finance its business the Government will supply the money?

Mr. FOSTER. Not in this bill. This does not provide that they can supply one cent to anybody.

Mr. HELM. How are these funds to be used?

Mr. FOSTER. These funds are to be used in buying and selling at the market price. The Government might procure all the imported article that came into the country and distribute it among the manufacturers using that material.

Mr. HELM. Now, let us follow that up. If one of these supposedly weak subsidiary organizations of the Steel Corporation should go out and find a prospect for one of these minerals could that organization come back to the Bureau of Mines and secure funds, or a guaranty, to operate this prospect or open it up? What safeguard is there in this bill to prevent these large, overpowering business concerns from manipulating this bill to their advantage?

Mr. FOSTER. Under the food bill, the man who raises 50,000 bushels of wheat has just the same guaranty of the price for his product as the man who raises 100 bushels of wheat, has he not?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. There is just the same thing in this bill and nothing more.

Mr. HELM. The difference is that the man who raises 100 or 50,000 bushels of wheat is either a renter of land or the owner of land in his individual capacity, while it might be that there is a possibility for the United States Steel Corporation or some similar organization so to use the funds provided in this bill that it can prospect to its own advantage at the expense of the United States Government.

Mr. FOSTER. No. The guaranteed price is the same to everybody. If any organization goes out and develops the production of any mineral, it will get the guaranteed price.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. On page 11, in the first part of section 12, it is provided that the Secretary of the Interior may requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any undeveloped, partly developed, or idle mineral land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant and to develop and operate the same.

Now, in the lower part of Alaska is a little smelter that has been running in opposition to the consolidated smelters. This little smelter is near the home of the present Delegate from Alaska. That smelter has struggled along all these years, and has seen the ore from the big Guggenheim mine go right by it in boats to the consolidated smelters on Puget Sound. Now, suppose the little smelter gets plenty of Government money and becomes a pretty good-sized smelter, what is to prevent the directors of that smelter, after it has been developed with Government money, selling it out to the other smelters, receiving enough money to pay the Government back, but also putting a large sum of money into their own pockets?

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman mean that the Government will take it over?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Government may develop and operate it until it is a real smelter, doing business in competition with the big consolidated smelter.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government would not take over a smelter or a mine unless it was undeveloped or unless that smelter or mine refused to operate, and it became necessary to operate it for the successful prosecution of this war. Then the Government would have the right to take that smelter or mine if it became necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. All right and proper. I am for that, and am willing to let the matter of selling out or unloading wait for the future to look after.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand from the chairman of the committee that there is no possibility of any such manipulation that this revolving fund or any part of it can be used in the way I have suggested.

Mr. FOSTER. I can assure the gentleman that there is not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. COX. I want to offer an amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. ANDERSON. That has priority.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the word "may," in line 16, page 13, and insert the word "shall," and on page 13, in line 18, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall," and in line 19, on the same page, strike out the words "or otherwise."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COX: Page 13, line 16, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall." Page 13, line 18, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall." Page 13, line 19, strike out the words "or otherwise."

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to that amendment.

Mr. COX. Then I do not want to debate it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I presume in line 19 the two words "or otherwise" were placed there for the purpose of protecting persons who did not take the oath. If the gentleman should strike out the words "or otherwise," he ought to insert "or affirmation."

Mr. COX. No; for the reason that I presume every Member is going to vote for this bill, although I do not think that anybody wants it. This is a vital section aimed at what is designated in the section as evil practices, and the corporation or individual who proposes to get the benefit of the legislation ought to report solemnly under oath so that they will have no way of equivocation whatever.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But suppose the keeper of the records of the corporation, or suppose the individual, should belong to a religious sect which objects to taking an oath.

Mr. COX. Then let him affirm.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is the point I am making. With the gentleman's amendment it would have to be verified under oath. If you strike out the words "or otherwise," you should substitute the words "or affirmation."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting after the word "oath" the words "or affirmation."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification asked for by the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as modified, offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to perfect the text. It is to strike out the period after the word "agent" in line 25, page 13, and insert the matter the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25, page 13, strike out the period and insert the words "at a salary of not in excess of $2,000 per year."

Mr. COX. Will the committee accept that amendment. I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not care anything about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to make a statement as to a matter which seems to be somewhat misapprehended. The impression seems to prevail that anyone offering an amendment to perfect the text has a preferential right to the floor as against some one else who has been recognized and made a motion to strike out the section. That is a mistake. No one seeking to offer a perfecting amendment, has a right to recognition as against another who has been recognized, and moved to strike out the section or paragraph proposed to be perfected. There is a relation of priority in the matter, but it relates to the order in which the motions shall be submitted. No one who has obtained the floor on a motion to strike out a section, can be taken from his feet by another Member seeking to offer an amendment to perfect the text. The Member offering an amendment to strike out has a right to proceed with his argument to conclusion, and then before the motion is put if some one else wishes to offer a perfecting amendment, he can be recognized to submit, and speak to the same. Two amendments will then be pending, but under the rules, the perfecting amendment must be put before the amendment to strike out. The Chair makes this statement because there seems to be a misapprehension as to the relative rights of Members of the committee in this connection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. As I have said before, I think all of us desire to give the administration every authority that is essential to carry on the war and procure the necessary materials for that purpose, and to establish the Government control which is essential to secure those materials. But the section under consideration goes so far, and is so absolutely unlimited in its terms, that it seems to me it is susceptible of being used for most oppressive purposes.

This section was taken from a similar section in the food bill, but that section was limited to the operations and transactions of a speculative character upon exchanges, boards of trade, and institutions of a similar character, and related only to transactions upon such exchanges. The provision was necessary in connection with the food bill, because it was expected that the Food Administration in obtaining control of the wheat crop would undertake to become the sole purchaser of wheat, and it was therefore necessary to prohibit speculative transactions of boards of trade which might have an effect of increasing the Government's obligations under the minimum price, or which might have the effect of destroying the control the Government sought to establish.

Now, this provision is not limited to transactions of boards of trade or upon exchanges. It is universal in its application, and under it the Secretary might issue regulations touching any practice which in his judgment, or in the judgment of some one in his office, would be considered an evil practice. Under this section practically any sale which had the effect of enhancing or depressing the price—and any sale must have some effect on the price—might and would be prohibited.

If gentlemen of the committee can state any reasons at all for leaving the section in the bill, I am willing to withdraw my opposition, but I doubt if any member of the committee can suggest any sound reason for leaving it in the bill. No one suggested it in the hearings before the committee, except one man, and this is the reason that he gave. He was asked by Mr. SAUNDERS this question:

I notice that section 13 deals with the question of market manipulations following the provisions of the food bill. Do you think that is necessary with reference to these necessaries named in the bill?

Mr. MOORE. This may be a good club to have up your sleeve in case anything unexpected should turn up.

In other words, this provision is designed to furnish the department with a club by which it may prevent any individual doing any sort of a decent business from doing that business in his own way, under which they can compel men not doing business on an exchange, but men anywhere, to do business in the particular way in which the department desires to have it done. It seems to me that this section in the broad way in which it is now drawn contains such possibilities of oppression and it is intended for that purpose according to the testimony, that it ought not to remain in the bill. If it were limited to transactions upon an exchange, if it were limited in such a way that it were possible even in the remotest degree to know how it was to be exercised, and for what purpose, I would have no objection to it, but there is nothing in it, no rule of action by which we or the department can be guided.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the committee had this section under consideration for some little time, and it felt that in the administration of the bill it might be found very necessary that such a section as this should be in the law in order to prevent manipulations and evil practices that might come about with these necessary war materials. So the section was kept in the bill. I realize, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has said, that there is not possibly direct necessity for this section in this bill, as there might have been in the Food Administration bill, because there we have the boards of trade and all that, and yet what we want to do is to provide the Government with a club, to use if it be necessary, against those who want to follow evil practices. It seems to me that it is important that the Government should have that power.

Mr. ANDERSON. May I ask the gentleman what evil things he has in mind?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know what may come in the development of this, but if they do come in such a manner that it is necessary to use this club, the Government may say to a producer, "You are performing an evil practice here in the way in which you are conducting your business, and we propose to apply section 12 to you."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Has not the Government a most powerful club in the ability to fix the price?

Mr. FOSTER. That is true. The Government has large powers there, but it seems to me that if, in the language of the bill, it should be found "essential in order to produce undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices, * * * hereafter in this section called evil practices," then the President should be authorized to prescribe such regulations as are necessary to prevent it.

Mr. FESS. My thought was that this applies only to the manipulation of prices, and if the Government has the power given in the bill to fix the price, it would seem to me that it would relieve the necessity for this section.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government will not fix the price on all of these articles. It is not very likely that it will. The price of many of them will go along in their usual way, but it may become necessary when they are manipulating the prices of the articles, doing many of those things that ought not to be done, that the price should be fixed, and this will give them power to prevent that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing for the Government to have a club to prevent one thing specified in lines 9 and 10, namely, "unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries"? In other words, to prevent public dishonesty.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly; that is one of the things.

Mr. FESS. If you are going into that, you have a pretty good-sized job on your hands.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. As I understand it, the Government can now do two things. It can fix the price if necessary and can commandeer the article.

Mr. FOSTER. It can.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. And yet the committee deems it necessary to grant further power.

Mr. FOSTER. If it should be desired to do so, to have that price to compel those things to be done or not to be done.

Mr. ROBBINS. How are you going to enforce this section, which is a criminal section, when you have no fixed market, such as the board of trade or a metallic exchange where these goods are sold? What would be the market price which a man would violate to render him subject to the provisions of this section?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a market for many of these articles quoted, but not in the general way that other articles are quoted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANDERSON) there were—ayes 22, noes 15.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That whenever the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production within the United States, its insular possessions, Territories, and District of Columbia of any one or more necessaries, and that it is essential that the producers of any one or more of such necessaries shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, with the approval of the President, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance as practicable, to determine and fix and give public notice of what, under specified conditions, are reasonable guaranteed prices, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The Secretary of the Interior shall, from time to time, establish and promulgate such regulations, with the approval of the President, as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment and differences in price for any of the several specified necessaries. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of these specified necessaries that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any necessaries produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period, not exceeding two years, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. Such regulations shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any of these necessaries produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section, and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty, if any, on each of the necessaries and to the value of each of the necessaries at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon each of these necessaries, when imported, in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon any of these necessaries under any then existing tariff law of the United States. For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential, in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the Secretary of the Interior with the approval of the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any of these necessaries for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store, or to sell, dispose of, and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any Government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war, or to use the same as supplies for any department or agency of the Government of the United States. Whenever and wherever it is in his judgment necessary for the effective prosecution of the war, the President, through the Secretary of Interior, is authorized and empowered to fix the prices of necessaries, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of production, sale, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the sale or disposal of necessaries under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 18, after the word "empowered," strike out down to and including the word "dealer," as follows, to wit, "to fix the prices of necessaries, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered comes on page 16, line 18, and the expression that I desire to have stricken out is this:

To fix the prices of necessaries, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer.

The appeal that has been made to the committee in the debate upon this bill has been an appeal to support this measure upon the ground that it is a war measure, because of an absolute necessity to stimulate the production of these necessaries in the United States. One reason that has been advanced is that a great tonnage of these necessaries comes from foreign countries, and it is necessary to use ships to carry them here, and if we produce them in the United States that great amount of shipping may be released. In the hearings before the committee, which took a number of days, there was not a suggestion or statement from anyone that there was any necessity of preventing profiteering with reference to any of the necessaries named.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman construe the language which he seeks to strike out to authorize the fixing of maximum prices?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do. That is the particular feature of that expression to which I desire to direct my argument. In order to increase the domestic production we have a guaranteed minimum price authorized. We have the right in the Secretary of the Interior to go out and make contracts for many of these necessaries, with a view of inducing the producers in the United States to enlarge their production, to increase their output, in order that this country may be supplied.

The Secretary of the Interior when he appeared before our committee laid great stress and great emphasis upon the necessity of production in great quantities of those necessaries within the borders of the United States, and I think it might be well to refer to what the Secretary of the Interior said. On page 7 of the hearings he uses this language:

This bill is primarily a bill for the development of what might be called the minor minerals in the United States.

Then, on page 8, he says:

That is the kind of thing that can be done throughout the United States, provided you can give some kind of guaranty that the man who develops these new properties which are in competition with the materials which come from abroad where there are larger deposits, provided that the man who develops the small deposits in the United States can be assured that he will get his money out of the investment that he puts into the development of these mines.

Again, on page 10, the Secretary of the Interior stated, and when he stated this he laid great stress upon this fact:

We have got to develop every resource we have; we have got to prepare ourselves in spirit and materially for such a contest.

Referring to his former statement that this morning's paper quotes Von Hindenburg as saying, that the first act has ended:

So I ask you gentlemen, in considering this bill, to look upon it from two standpoints—from the standpoint that you would have looked upon it five years ago, in time of peace, as a thing that should be done so as to reveal what America possesses, and as a measure that is necessary for the conduct of this great enterprise upon which we are embarked.

Then, later, he says:

We know approximately what we have. We simply want to be able to say to the small man and to the large man, "Gentlemen, go farther in and find what you have; bring it out, and we will see that you are not ruined by the competition of foreign countries."

And he adds:

I think that is good Americanism; I think that is common sense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman having five minutes, but I would like to see if we could not agree upon time on this section.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have an amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. This section is probably the most debatable one of the entire bill. I think there are probably gentlemen who will have amendments and some would like to talk to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we might agree on time.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would rather not at this time, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to get through; all right, we will let it run along for a few minutes and then I will make my request again.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request for five additional minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to see whether I understand exactly the gentleman's argument. Is his argument this, That the fixing of the maximum price in advance would tend to curtail rather than increase production?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; that is the point.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This bill, as has been said a number of times in this discussion, was taken largely from the food bill; in fact, if you read the hearings, you will find that Dr. Manning stated that it was copied from the Agricultural bill, by which he meant the food bill.

I want this committee to keep in mind this fact, that this part which I seek to strike out is added to the similar section in the food bill from which it is copied. In other words, this section which proposes to fix a maximum price has no precedent in the food bill, and it has no precedent in any legislation that has been passed since the beginning of the war except the one instance of coal. Now, I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the fuel question. We all have our views about that. I do not think it has been altogether successful. A great deal of criticism has been made against Dr. Garfield, but I think when we consider the facts it will appear that Dr. Garfield is not the only man to blame because of the failure of the Fuel Administration.

Back of the order that Dr. Garfield issued is the legislation which this Congress passed authorizing the fixing of a maximum price for coal. It is not a correct economic theory, and it was because of that illy advised legislation that the disaster in coal administration resulted. I do not think Dr. Garfield has in all cases been wise in the administration of fuel, but I do not think you could select any man, regardless of how wise he is, or how much he has studied economy, or how much he knew about coal, and put upon him the burden of fixing a maximum price, and have success in the administration of coal. But remember that the coal proposition is an entirely different one from the one under consideration. Coal is something that is used by all the people of the United States, while the use of these necessaries is limited.

An appeal was made to us that the coal barons were exacting immense profits from the people, and it was upon that appeal that that amendment was finally put into the food bill. But, gentlemen, who says that there has been any profiteering with reference to these necessaries? Not a single witness. What argument has been advanced in the general debate or at any other time authorizing the fixing of these maximum prices? These few words that I seek to have stricken out here—to fix the prices of necessaries wherever and whenever sold, by either producer or dealer—are simply the weasel words used in the last part of the last act, which draws all the blood out of the desirable portions of the bill. I stood up in general debate and said I was heartily in favor of this bill, because it encourages the industry. We undertake to appropriate $50,000,000. I do not know how much will be appropriated when it is finally acted upon, but this Congress is willing to appropriate millions of money, even if some of those millions shall be wasted, in order to encourage production and increase the quantity of these important minerals. But this Congress would be unwise, it seems to me, to undertake to go into the realm of stimulating the production of these minerals, enact this law, which is subject to some criticism, give all these vast powers with the purpose of increasing the production, and then in a few sentences destroy all of the efficacy of all the other portions of the bill that tend toward the increase in production.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman submit to an inquiry?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. ROBBINS. If you turn back to section 11, already adopted——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBBINS. If you turn back to section 11, on page 10 of the bill, you will find there is a provision in line 16 that provides thus:

To purchase, store, provide storage facilities for, and sell necessaries at reasonable prices, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior with the approval of the President.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is the price after the Government——

Mr. ROBBINS. You are proposing to strike out the price-fixing clause?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am not proposing to strike out this. This is the general price-fixing clause which provides that you can put a maximum price on all these necessaries.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This is a minimum price on these necessaries?

Mr. ROBBINS. It would be a minimum or maximum. It would be the price.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. With a minimum guaranteed price I have no quarrel, and anyone who will support this bill will support it because it proposes to fix a minimum price or guarantee a price for producers, or because it authorizes the contract with the producers in order to encourage production; but the contention I make here is that this provision fixing prices, an unprecedented thing except in the coal proposition, absolutely destroys everything of value in all the rest of the bill, which is to encourage production.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose there is no such power as this conferred upon the President; would there be any danger of an undue enhancement of prices through private manipulation?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think so, because I think this bill forbids combinations, forbids agreements for the purpose of enhancing the price, and it gives the power to the Government to requisition and take over anything it wants to. It gives the Government the power to protect itself against any profiteering, and nobody suggests that any profiteering is likely to occur.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But to take over these plants because the price is too high is a much more drastic remedy than to fix the price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. FESS. I understand the gentleman's view of the minimum price is to stimulate production, while the maximum price would be a limitation of the production?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. One operates against the other.

Mr. FESS. And that this bill is specifically for the production of these needed minerals?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And therefore the maximum price would not operate to increase production?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think that is pretty clearly understood.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And in further answer to the question asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], I want to say that the earlier provisions of this bill give ample protection by regulation to prevent excessive profits, and that is one thing, and the fixing of an absolutely arbitrary price is another thing. That is illustrated in the coal administration. They fixed the price in my district, and some of the mines could dig the coal at that price, but at some of the wagon mines it was fixed below the cost of production. This bill authorizes the fixing of arbitrary prices above which a man will not sell the goods he produces.

Mr. BLACK. I just wanted to ask if the gentleman does not think that under the licensing provision of this bill it would be within the power of whoever administers it to fix the maximum price, even though the language you refer to is stricken out of the bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The provision with reference to the regulations forbids the charging of exorbitant prices and making illegal profits; but that is all directed to the question of profits. This is not dealing with the question of profits at all. The Government has the right to fix absolutely the price, regardless of any profit that the person could make.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In a moment. I want to make a suggestion, and that suggestion is this: That Mr. Hoover has been able to handle the price situation in fairly good shape, and Mr. Hoover's administration has been fairly successful, regardless of the criticisms that have been made against it. He has made mistakes, but the reason why the Food Administration was more successful than the Fuel Administration was because the Food Administrator was not called upon to exercise this power as to maximum prices. Those who administer the act will probably think that the granting of the power means that they shall exercise that power, and the mere power lodged in the hands of one person to fix the price will absolutely curtail the production. You might just as well undertake to encourage home production by enacting a tariff law that protects the industry and then say that whenever the President sees fit he could bring us back to free trade, where it would not be protected. In other words, what is needed is stability, and all the parts of the bill that have been praised are those that propose to give us production. That is the crying need. We are in no danger of profiteering. Suppose we do have to pay a little more. The question of excessive prices is not nearly as important to be guarded against as having a production under the amount needed to make the war munitions that we absolutely must have. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] who preceded me failed to take note of the fact that the Government is bound to protect itself against the possibility of overproduction. If his argument were sound, it would apply to the provision which confers upon the President the power to increase tariff duties on these various articles. The Government must retain the power to increase tariff duties in order to prevent an oversupply of these necessaries. It may find itself with an enormous quantity of material on its hands. It may be compelled to sell that material. The law does not authorize the Government to continue the operation of any mine or any of these operations subsequently to the termination of the war, and in order to protect itself it is compelled to secure itself against an oversupply It must have the right to fix the tariff to suit conditions, and it must have the right to fix the maximum. Otherwise the bill is absolutely indefensible. You can only stand for this bill on the theory that the Government is preparing for the possibilities of a very long war.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Pardon me; I will yield in one moment. You can only stand for this bill on the theory that the Government is preparing for a long contest.

Mr. JAMES. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I do.

Mr. JAMES. Did not Mr. Hoover say before the committee that the only weak link in the food law was that it did not carry a determination of a fair profit to the retail distributor?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; but the point is this: If you get yourself to vote $50,000,000 out of the people's money in order to encourage private industry, in order to help private owners of holes in the ground to develop mines, and then at the conclusion of the war contingency to permit these individual owners of the ground to enrich themselves by having a mine developed at the expense of the Government solely because there was an incidental benefit to the Government during the short period of the war; if you permit that, you must necessarily protect the Government against the contingency of an oversupply, against the contingency of large quantities of these products coming to the Government with the Government as the guarantor of the price. How can the Government guarantee a minimum price for all the products of these mines without at the same time securing itself by possessing the power to fix a maximum price?

The gentleman is mistaken in applying the theory which prevails in the private market—in applying the theory which is supposed to prevail through the operation of the law of supply and demand. There is no such law; but it is presumed that there prevails in the private market a law of supply and demand, a sort of a natural law, unaffected by anything men will do. The gentleman deals with an extraordinary situation. Here is the Government, the guarantor of a minimum price. There are large mines, there are large opportunities for the production of these articles; this country can produce five or six or ten times as much as it needs; the only reason that we have been importing some of these articles is because it has been cheaper to import them. The basis of all tariff legislation heretofore has been free trade in raw materials, so as to promote manufacture. We will find ourselves in this situation: The Government is to be the guarantor of a minimum price, which is supposed to be an attractive price, which is supposed to guarantee more than a reasonable profit, without any opportunity to limit the output or limit the price. Instead of 2,000,000 tons, the Government may find itself with 10,000,000 tons of minerals. Where will the Government be?

Mr. BUTLER. Having guaranteed the minimum?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; having guaranteed the minimum. That was the necessity for the provision in this bill.

The difficulty with this bill is that it is all a piece of speculation. I am opposed to the principle of the thing; but I am going to vote for it, because it is supposed to be necessary to carry on the war. I am opposed to the very idea of it—that public money should be used to help develop private ownership in natural resources.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to the gentleman having five minutes, but can we not agree upon a limit of time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to gentlemen offering amendments.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want 10 minutes on this proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Reserving the right to object, I should like to discuss this particular amendment at least 10 minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Can we not agree on time for the whole section and all amendments thereto?

Mr. FOSTER. We have been very liberal about debate on this bill.

Mr. LONDON. All the debate revolves around the same thing.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think there ought to be rather liberal debate on this section and all amendments thereto. Let us see if we can not agree to that.

Mr. FOSTER. Can we not go ahead then and finish the reading of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, we can not agree to that.

Mr. FOSTER. I have stood on this floor for three or four days trying to get some limitation on debate. Of course, we can not fix any limitation in the absence of a quorum, as everybody knows.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is an important section, and the next section, providing the amount of money to be appropriated, is also important.

Mr. FOSTER. We have already had 30 minutes on this section. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I will have to object to that, as it will not give time to all those who wish to speak. I have taken no time on this bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have not opened my mouth, and I want five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not saving any time for myself.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Make it an hour.

Mr. FOSTER. I will agree, then, to make it one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has evidently had intimations from various gentlemen who want time. Will the gentleman furnish a list to the Chair?

Mr. FOSTER. That the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] have 5 minutes, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] 10 minutes, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] 5 minutes, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] 5 minutes, and the remainder of the hour we would like to reserve for ourselves.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] come in?

Mr. FOSTER. That is outside of whatever time he may secure.

Mr. COX. Will the various amendments that are to be offered be voted on at the conclusion of the hour?

Mr. FOSTER. Let us vote on them as we go along.

The CHAIRMAN. The time taken in voting not to be considered a part of the hour.

Mr. WINGO. The hour to be actual debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the list of names proposed in this arrangement and the time for each: The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], 5 minutes; the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE], 5 minutes; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], 5 minutes; the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], 10 minutes; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD], 5 minutes; the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], 5 minutes; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], 5 minutes; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], 5 minutes; the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], 5 minutes; and 10 minutes for the committee. That makes an hour. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] desires some time outside of that.

Mr. GARLAND. I have been out of the Hall for a moment. I would like two minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. We will see that the gentleman gets it.

Mr. LONDON. I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is to make a request for time which is not to be considered a part of the hour. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto terminate at the expiration of the hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] desire?

Mr. LONDON. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HICKS. Is not the principle underlying this bill, in a general way, the application of the doctrine of protection?

Mr. LONDON. No; the ordinary principle of protection has nothing to do with it, because the tariff legislation of this country has been based, and in most countries is based, upon the admission of as much raw material as possible free of duty. This bill has absolutely nothing to do with protection. You are dealing here with an extraordinary situation. The statement was made before the committee that the minerals mentioned in this bill represented an import of about 2,000,000 long tons a year, three-quarters of which, at least, could be eliminated in case of extreme necessity, and hope is held out that by offering an attractive price and giving the Government an enormous sum of money, to be used as a revolving fund, that the production of the minerals in sufficiently large quantities will be accomplished.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. FESS. I understood that gentleman to say that the protective tariff system is based upon the admission of raw materials free.

Mr. LONDON. I do not want to get into a discussion on the protective tariff. I know that it is discussed at funerals and weddings, but I have no time for it now. In most countries tariffs to encourage manufactures admit raw materials free.

Mr. FESS. That is not the case in this country.

Mr. LONDON. It was with the last tariff.

Mr. FESS. That principle was written into the Wilson bill in 1894, and that was the first time it was brought to light.

Mr. HICKS. The principle of this bill is to increase production, is it not?

Mr. LONDON. It is intended to stimulate production; whether it will or not I do not know. Now, I want to answer the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], which I was proceeding to do until interrupted by an attempt at a tariff discussion. I believe as a rule the gentleman's suggestions are sound, but he has not well considered this proposition. If the United States is to retain the necessary power to protect itself against overproduction, it must retain the power of fixing a maximum price.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. My understanding of the gentleman's argument is that because we guarantee a certain price, therefore there may be a great production and the Government should have the right to curtail the price.

Mr. LONDON. The Government should have the right to protect itself against being called upon to pay an extraordinarily large price for a larger production than it really needs.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think that if the United States guaranteed a certain price it ought to pay that price?

Mr. LONDON. Undoubtedly; I speak of the minimum price. The point is this: These minerals are in the United States. The reason they have been imported heretofore is because it has been cheaper to import them into the United States than to produce them here. Now, an attractive price is held out to everybody who will produce them, and my point is that the Government must protect itself and its own Treasury against overproduction in these very articles.

Mr. ANDERSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. If there is an overproduction, the danger will not be that the price will be too high but that it will fall below the Government guaranty.

Mr. LONDON. No; the price will never fall below the Government guaranty. You put the Government in this absurd position which you would not ask of an individual or corporation. A corporation would not make a contract with any party to supply to it an article in unlimited quantities with a guaranteed price. When you guarantee the price, you must limit the output or reserve the right to fix a maximum price, and that was the object of this provision.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is it the gentleman's understanding that the Government is under the necessity of taking all that is produced at the guaranteed price?

Mr. LONDON. Of course; that is the bill.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. And the Government has no discretion?

Mr. LONDON. No choice about it. The proclamation is issued enumerating certain minerals and fixing the price. Anybody producing them afterwards will say that he has incurred expenses in the production of the minerals covered by the guaranteed price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], because it seeks to strike out of the bill a method of price fixing which has been a failure the world over. The world is not altogether without experience in the matter of legal price fixing as distinguished from economic price fixing. From the very earliest date men have tried to fix prices by legal methods. The ancient Babylonians attempted it 2,250 years before Christ. The Athenians attempted it; the Romans attempted it; the Hindus attempted it; the French tried it in the thirteenth century. It has been tried by every nation in the world engaged in the present war. Legal price fixing, as distinguished from economic price fixing, has been a failure the world over. In the first place, if the price is fixed low, the only way to enforce is to put people in jail, and you can not put enough people in jail to enforce a legal price which is economically too low. If you fix it too high, the immediate effect is that the normal price of competition immediately rises to the maximum price. The net result is a higher price than normally obtains. We have made a success in fixing the price of wheat; and why? Because we undertook to control the commodity. The only articles as to which price fixing has been a success are those commodities on which the Government here, in England, and in France has controlled the price by controlling the commodity itself. This bill includes five different methods by which the Government can control the price of the commodity: First, it can control the profits of the manufacturer or producer under the license section. Second, it may control because it has the power to buy and sell any portion or all of the product. Third, it can control because it has the right to contract for the entire output or any proportion of the output for a period of two years. Fourth, it can fix the price because it has the power to requisition the commodity at a price fixed by the Government, and, finally, it can fix the price because it has the power to guarantee the minimum price below which the price of the article can not fall. These are economic methods. They have been tried and have succeeded. These are, in part, the methods by which the ordinary individual in private life maintains the price, and these are the only methods by which they can be established. I have talked with Mr. Hoover about this matter in private conversation a great many times. Mr. Hoover will say to any gentleman who will ask him that the experience of all European countries and of America is to the effect that price fixing is successful only where it is possible for the Government to fully control the commodity, and under no other circumstances. There is another difficulty connected with legal price fixing, and it is this: First, when you fix a price by tacking it up on the wall and saying to the world that this is the price, you destroy the law of supply and demand, although my good friend from New York [Mr. LONDON] says that there is no such law, which acts not only as an agency for the fixing of the price but also as a distribution agency. In other words, unless a community which has a low supply can by increasing the price in that community draw the supply from some other point where there is a surplus, there will be no even distribution of the commodity. Secondly, whenever you attempt this artificial method of legal price fixing you are obliged at some time to establish a purely arbitrary and purely governmental machinery of distribution. You must set up an entirely new and artificial machinery of distribution; otherwise you will have local shortage and famine.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the gentleman overlook the fact that in this case the Government is the sole buyer, because it is the guarantor?

Mr. ANDERSON. If it is the sole buyer and controls the entire product it can buy at its own price under the power of requisition, and it can sell it at its own price, because it is the owner of the property, and it may sell it to licensees if it so desires. It can maintain the price if it does control the entire commodity.

The argument made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], it seems to me, touching overproduction is absolutely fallacious. The great fear expressed by Mr. Hoover and by all gentlemen who argued the question of increased price on wheat was that if the price was fixed too high we would get such overproduction that the natural operation of competitive conditions would reduce the price below the Government guaranty and thereby involve the Government in large expenditures in maintaining a minimum price. So there is nothing in that argument.

There is another difficulty with this method of sticking a price on a wall and saying "This is the price." It has no flexibility; it can not adjust itself to dislocations of the transportation machinery and overconsumption in one place and underconsumption in another, or overproduction in one place and underproduction in another. It dislocates and must dislocate the entire distribution and price-fixing functions of the country, and that has been the experience not only here but in France and England and in Germany as well. I repeat again, that the enactment of the language which the gentleman from Indiana seeks to strike out simply means authorizing the Government to enter into what has been demonstrated to be an economic failure the world over.

I do not object to price fixing in this emergency if it is necessary and is done in a way that is economically sound, as in the case of wheat, because if it is done that way it is successful; but when it is done under the theory of sticking a price on the wall and saying that is the price it inevitably fails. We ought not to encourage a method of procedure or administration that is certain to fail.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know of anything that I can say which will overemphasize the undesirability of entering at this time or at any time upon a system of legal price fixing because of the entirely harmful and dislocating effect of that method of price fixing upon the industry wherever it has been tried. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS rose.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman desire to speak on this amendment?

Mr. FESS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] made a very clear statement of the difference in operation between minimum and maximum price fixing. I think that he stated an economic proposition that is aquiesced in by all the leading economists, that minimum price fixing by the Government would have the tendency of stimulating production; that is, it guarantees to the producer that if he produces an article he will not have it left on his hands, but he will always have a buyer at a price below which the purchaser can not go. In other words, he not only has the price fixed below which the purchaser can not go, but is sure of a purchaser for all he produces and he knows, therefore, that he will not have any of it left on his hands. The purpose of such legislation is to stimulate production. That is a fundamental principle. The maximum price, on the other hand, is absolutely in antithesis to that. You fix a maximum price not to stimulate production but to curtail production, and the gentleman from New York very succinctly stated that the maximum price ought to be fixed in order to insure the country against overproduction. It is a statement of the same thing in a little different language. However, when you come to the discussion of the question of overproduction it is always a doubt whether it is overproduction or underconsumption. One school of economists declare there is no such thing as overproduction, but it is always underconsumption, but I think we have spent an immense amount of time in hairsplitting discussion of such a question, that it is no matter to us if we were out on a boat and it was capsized whether we went down or the water came up, it would have exactly the same effect on us.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is there any possible argument in favor of this bill except that it is to guard against underproduction?

Mr. FESS. I think that is wholly the purpose, so stated in the act, and its proponents who urge it, as can be read in the hearings on the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The whole purpose?

Mr. FESS. It is to guard against underproduction and thereby insure, by stimulation of production, the needed supply; and for that reason, and that alone, it appears to me that there is some justification for the bill from the point of view that we need these articles, must have them. Under the present situation we are not producing in sufficient quantities at home, and we can not safely depend upon getting them from abroad. If we had the ships, quite probably we might secure from outside of the country our satisfaction, but it is well known that ships are our greatest need at this time, and it would seem to me, although greatly averse to this sort of legislation, the Government is justified in taking this step at this time.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. In just a minute. The one specified purpose of this legislation is to stimulate production rather than curtail it. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have very great respect, as the gentleman has reasons to know, for his opinion upon any proposition that he discusses. This thought occurred to me. I agree with him that perhaps the prime purpose of this bill is to stimulate production in certain rare minerals, but another important feature, of course, is to control distribution; but does not the gentleman see this trouble that might arise? Take any one of these minerals that we feel we must stimulate by offering a guaranteed price. We can not see from the top of the ground. Some man or men will open a mine that is a successful mine and will produce marvelous amounts of this stuff, maybe. Under the Government guaranteed price there is no protection left to the Government, no means left to the Government to protect itself, and it might involve quite large sums of money.

Mr. FESS. I would say to my friend that I reciprocate his good opinion, and I am ready to concede the force of his statement when applied to articles of abundant production; if, for example, you are going to take, say, mercury, an article of which we are producing now more than we need, or sulphur, another of which we are producing more than we need, and molybdenum or bromine, and so forth, there would appear some reasons for your contention. I called attention to these very articles when we first began the consideration of this measure, and asked why articles produced in quantities beyond our need should be enumerated in such a bill as this. It would appear that strong influence must have been exerted to get the encouragement of Government assistance back of these producers. Not even a minimum price should be granted on articles of which we produce an abundance.

Instead of applying a maximum price to the entire list in order to cover these fees, it would be wise to omit these from the bill since this bill is for the purpose of stimulating prices and not curtailing them, and I think we ought to cut out the maximum price.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to inject a partisan discussion at this time, but this proposed legislation in the light of the long and heated debate between the two parties for the past 50 years on a real American policy has a peculiar pertinent significance in this hour of crisis. The Republican Party has waged a warfare with the Democratic Party over placing the country where it would be independent of the world for its needs. The Democratic Party now sees the strength of our contention.

Mr. Chairman, this measure seeks to secure the necessary supply of ores, metals, and minerals for war purposes. The sponsors of the bill declare the reason for such legislation is want of ships. That is, articles that must be imported demand ships to carry them. Every ship thus employed, say the proponents of this bill, is taken from the supply necessary for exportation of munitions and men to Europe. In order to save the ships that carry ores, metals, and minerals from South America, Spain, and the Scandinavian countries, this bill proposes to release this demand on transportation by producing the necessaries here at home. The method proposed is for the Government to guarantee a price for the elements for a period of the war and a fixed time thereafter. It will be seen that whatever the purpose, here is a governmental and official encouragement of development of home industries. It is not technically a subsidy, but rather a guarantee of a profit. The proponents of this bill, especially the Democratic Members, disdain any interest in the encouragement of home industry, but declare were the country supplied with ships they would prefer to continue to buy abroad rather than develop at home; to invest capital and employ labor abroad rather than at home, especially when the initial cost is less abroad than at home. This is the same old free-trade doctrine.

While I intend to vote for this measure, because we must have the goods, I will not allow our Democratic friends to overlook the penalty we as a Nation must now suffer from their shortsighted free-trade policy. Had an American policy been pursued, to center American energy and capital as well as labor upon producing from our mines at a reasonable price determined by the cost of the production, this country would not now be asked to do the heretofore unheard-of task of guaranteeing a fixed price for all and any quantity of the elements mentioned in this proposed measure. Had such a policy been in vogue instead of the unfortunate Underwood Act, ready capital would have welcomed profitable investment, in which the American workmen would have been steadily employed at an American wage, and this Nation would not have been in the unfortunate situation of dependency upon any foreign country for our needs. We would not suffer the danger of fatalities from lack of necessary elements when the world is at war. This development of our own natural resources to the point of national independence is a fundamental argument for protection. It is one of the cardinal principles of the protectionist, who has unceasingly persisted in his contention that it is unpatriotic to pursue a policy which makes the Nation dependent upon any foreign country for any article of necessity if that article can be produced at home. Let our Democratic friends face the situation which has resulted largely from their shortsighted policy of free trade, the relief of which this measure is now proposed by them.

This bill enumerates 39 different articles which are declared to be necessary elements in our war work. Some of these articles, at least four or five, such as bromine, sulphur, mercury, and molybdenum, we now produce our needs. Others we produce various percentages of our needs. Dr. George Otis Smith, of the Geological Survey, who possesses the reputation of accurate information, is authority for the following percentages:

In the case of antimony we produced from domestic ores only about 10 per cent of what we needed; so I would put antimony at 10.

In the case of arsenic the corresponding figure would be 60; we came nearer our requirements with that.

In the case of bromine we have apparently met requirements, and we can express the production as 100 per cent there. We know the Government requirements for military purposes promise to be several times this year what they were last year; so we must not let this figure of 100 per cent please us too much, because there is the probability that we are facing a deficit in the production of bromine.

Our production of 42,000 tons of chromium ore last year met about 37 per cent of the requirements. We hope to increase that production this year to about 50,000 tons.

In the matter of the abrasives, corundum and emery, the requirements were more nearly met last year, say 90 per cent; and yet that 10 per cent that was lacking was of the highest grade of abrasive, of emery, which has hitherto been imported from Turkey, and the deficit was a serious one because it was the grade of emery that is especially needed in the manufacture of optical glass.

In the matter of graphite the domestic supply furnished 25 per cent of our consumption, but there again in the graphite which we especially need in connection with the expansion of our metal industry, namely, the graphite that is used in the making of crucibles, our American product last year was only about 11 per cent of the needs in the crucible grade of graphite. There is where we hope to stimulate production in the Southeastern States.

I have already mentioned magnesite, where our home production was about 99 per cent; and manganese was about 23 per cent. I may mention in this connection the record that we have made in the matter of magnesium, the metal. Formerly there was no production in this country of magnesium, and the supply from abroad being cut off a supply has been developed in this country, and the 1917 figures are very satisfactory; 115,800 pounds of this metal, a very light metal, so that weight means considerable quantity, and with the increased production there has been a corresponding decrease of the price, from something like $5 a pound early in 1916, to $2 or less a pound last year.

Molybdenum, another steel-hardening metal; our production can be stated at something over 100 per cent in that, because we export molybdenum largely because that is a steel-hardening metal more in favor with the English and the French than it is with our own steel makers.

In the matter of mercury we have increased our production until we are exporting it, and the corresponding figure indicative of our productive capacity is 120.

In the platinum metals I would say to Mr. Taylor that while the so-called "precious metals" are not included in this bill, something more precious than the precious metals is included, namely, the platinum metals, and, as Secretary Lane stated, there is where we find the real deficit. Our own home supply last year was only about 13 per cent of the platinum and the allied metals needed by our industries.

In the matter of pyrite last year our home production was 33 per cent; potash, as I have already stated, 10 per cent.

In the case of sulphur, that to some degree supplements the pyrite, although the two are not, of course, absolutely interchangeable; in the manufacture of sulphuric acid we are self-sufficient, to use Secretary Lane's expression; 105 is the figure for sulphur.

In tin, on the other hand, we produced only 1½ per cent of our requirements, mostly coming from the extreme corner of Alaska, as stated by Secretary Lane.

In tungsten our production was 65 per cent.

As to vanadium, it is hard to give a figure, because there again we are not large users, but I think we can safely say that we produce more than we consume.

Mica I omitted to mention, and mica is a mineral which is used especially in connection with electrical apparatus. Our production was 38 per cent of the consumption, but there again I must qualify the statement, because there are certain grades of mica that are especially adapted for special uses that come almost wholly from outside the country.

This bill is drafted on the basis that if we agree upon a price that will guarantee a profit to the producer we will secure the elements from our own mines. It must be such a basis, since we are told we can not depend on foreign countries, since we have not the ships to transport them. Had we the ships, this administration would undoubtedly continue to buy abroad rather than develop at home.

It would be highly edifying to reexamine the argument of the Democratic Members of the Sixty-third Congress in the discussion of the Underwood bill. When Republicans urged a protective rate on these needed ores, metals, and minerals in the interest of home production, that American enterprise might be stimulated and encouraged, that capital might be invested, and labor employed at an American scale of wages, they were met at every turn with the same old demagogic cry of robber tariff and special privilege. Now, when, as an inevitable consequence, the Nation's resources are undeveloped, while the needed elements still lie buried, awaiting the skill and genius of our country to develop them, the world in the vortex of war, and essential articles imperatively called for, here come our Democratic friends, now responsible for results, and propose to rectify the shortsighted policy which finds us the richest Nation of earth in resource, but in direful distress from lack of an American policy of industrial independence, and offer the guaranty of the Government to those who will by hook or crook furnish us with the necessaries so bountifully deposited within the bowels of the earth.

While as a policy I am sincerely opposed to governmental price fixing, and also to governmental ownership and operation, where it can be carried on by private enterprise, yet in the face of an imperative situation such as we now confront I have no other choice but to vote for the measure. But we here and now serve notice on the Democratic leaders that the country will hold their party responsible for the pitiable state of our mining industry, and no amount of protestation will be sufficient to explain away the folly of their policy of dependence upon foreign countries, which they now propose to correct by the socialistic remedy of making the Government responsible for needed production when by the employment of the sheerest common sense as applied to legislation private enterprise could and would have relieved the Government of all responsibility, and assured the Government at the same time the maximum of needed production. This bill is just 39 object lessons of the futility of free trade as a national policy and furnishes the severest indictment of the Democratic Party for its folly in fixing it upon the Nation, as well as a pitiable confession of the party's failure to employ wisdom as applied to the all-important issues before us.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I shall vote for the measure. It admits we have the necessary articles if we but use the means to produce them. I regret it seems necessary now to resort to this sort of legislation, all of which would have been avoided had we pursued the protective policy as applied to these items. But our Democratic friends repudiated that policy in 1913. The war has operated as a protective policy for the Nation in certain respects, as is noted in the matter of dyes, for which, prior to the war, we wholly depended upon Germany, but since the war closed out the German product American genius has developed the industry, which after the war, without protection, we will see destroyed if Germany is permitted free access to our markets, which God forbid.

While we will pass this bill giving authority to guarantee prices for these articles, we should immediately make certain our duty to restore the protection policy to take care of the problems after the war, and thereby avoid such governmental responsibility as this measure entails.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think that there is no Member of the House but that is loath to oppose any necessary legislation at this time. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the continual denial of the fact that there is any such economic law as the law of supply and demand. I am wondering if after awhile we will not get to the point where we shall be willing to try to amend the moral law, or the law of gravitation. There is perhaps no more definite law than the law of supply and demand, providing combination is eliminated. I think that is the opinion of every political economist in the world who is recognized as worthy of respect.

I am in favor of this amendment for the reason that I fear we may be led into the habit of legislating contrary to economic law, defending ourselves on the ground of the exigencies of the case. It may be that, more than we realize, we shall break down ultimately the basic, fundamental principles upon which sound legislation rests, and just as often as we can we ought to challenge any such breaking down of well-established principles by any proper amendment to the bill that may be proposed. It is for that reason particularly, and believing that all necessary power should be granted and granted frankly and gladly, that I say more and more we should challenge the granting of plenary power to any men or set of men in connection with matters upon which we legislate.

Now, this bill undertakes to provide for underproduction. That is the sole reason for which it is brought in. No one attempts to defend it on any other ground. It includes, in my judgment, certain minerals that ought not to be included, for there is an abundance of sulphur; there is an abundance of mercury. There may be in connection with the development of sulphur a difficult proposition of which we have not thought, the difficulty of working the mines where they are located, because of the physical obstacles that surround them.

White men and efficient labor can not be secured down there to work in those sulphur mines. And yet it is true that enough labor that can be taken there will produce the sulphur that we need without undue haste in legislating to that intent. And that is true in regard to mercury. But there are many of these minerals that are so rare that I doubt very much whether there is any danger at all, such as the gentlemen have been pleased to talk about here. But there is danger that the little mine may be absolutely shut out in connection with the fixing of a maximum price. Suppose a mine should be discovered that would yield large quantities at a very reasonable price and yet not more than 50 per cent of what we want? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have opportunity to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. In that case the small operator would never have any opportunity to develop, for the price fixed might easily be less than to justify the uncertainty in the opening of a small mine. The result would be just the opposite of that which the bill intends. Gentlemen have assured us that the intention is to stimulate production, to insure an adequate supply of these rare materials.

At the same time studied phrases to grant unlimited power to throttle the industry even before it is born are worked into the bill.

All needed power should be given, but almighty power belongs of right to the Infinite. All human agencies are fallible. To grant power to do what is unwise would work ruin if used unwisely. Power grows by what it feeds upon. The continual asking for grants of unlimited power is in itself an acknowledgment of weakness. The delegation of such power when not needed is a surrender of the rights of the House and a violation of our obligations under the Constitution.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to speak on this amendment?

Mr. ROBBINS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I just want to say a word. This amendment which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] offers seeks to strike out the right of the Government to fix the price at which these articles shall be sold, if it should become necessary. There was one notable instance of fixing price which Mr. Hoover, the Food Administrator, called to our attention, and that was in connection with insecticide, which had gone from 4 cents to 18 cents a pound, and he fixed the price at 8 cents a pound to the consumers, or those who use this article, and yet gave 100 per cent profit over the prewar price.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Hoover did that under the provisions of the food bill, which authorized regulations to prevent excessive profits.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And that, in this bill, is the part stricken out, or else it was a voluntary arrangement.

Mr. FOSTER. It was probably a voluntary arrangement. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the time may come when it will be necessary to fix some price to the people in this country that they may not be unduly charged for an article that is necessary to have. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. This bill deals with two classes of minerals, does it not, rare minerals and those minerals which have been largely imported, although they can be produced in enormous quantities here? Is not that true?

Mr. FOSTER. That is true.

Mr. LONDON. So that the Government needs the power of fixing the maximum price for the latter group of minerals. Those that have heretofore been imported and which can be produced here in large quantities will be thrown on the hands of the Government. Is not that the situation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. We are not fixing the maximum price now, but giving the Government the power to fix the price in a contingency.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. On that point I have heard it stated during this debate that if the Government guarantees the price of a commodity and it is produced in larger quantities than the Government expects, it is thought under this provision to fix a lower price. It seems to me that is not consistent.

Mr. FOSTER. No. That is not the idea.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill provides that the Government shall pay as much as the guaranty.

Mr. BLACK. I think that is as it should be.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. HAMLIN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 40.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. FOSTER and Mr. SANDERS of Indiana to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 46.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration House bill 11239, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 266 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote on which the failure of a quorum developed was on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]. A quorum of the committee now being present, the vote will be taken again.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the amendment upon which the vote is to be taken be reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 16, line 18, after the word "empowered," strike out to and including the word "dealer," being as follows: "To fix the prices of necessaries wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] will again take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 84.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 15, line 14, after the word "section," in line 14, strike out the word "and" and all of lines 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23 to the semicolon at the end of line 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "by reason of such necessaries being produced without the United States at a less cost than they can be within the United States, there shall be added to the then existing duty on any such necessaries an increased duty equal to the difference in the cost of producing said necessaries in the United States and the country in which the same are produced at a less cost."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if there is any virtue in this measure, it is in its purpose to encourage domestic production and to prohibit the importation of necessaries manufactured in foreign countries. Under this section it is sought to protect the United States Government against any liabilities that may arise by reason of the introduction of articles manufactured in foreign countries in consequence of a low rate of duty. I believe the section as it now reads is absolutely void because it is uncertain. The purpose in introducing the amendment that I propose is to make that certain. It is sought, if you please, to protect the United States against increased liability on account of the prices which it guarantees to the domestic producer, to protect it against a similar article being brought in from the outside. Now, the only manner in which that protection can be adequately had and definitely ascertained is through the investigation made by the President or some one under his authority to find out what is the difference in cost in producing that necessary abroad and in producing it in our own country; and in order that the Government may be protected against the increased liability, because of its having fixed a price thereon, there should be ascertained the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home. If that is then added it will accomplish the very purpose for which this portion of this section was created and it will make certain that which is now uncertain. It is a well-known principle of law that unless a measure of this character is made certain, or if it is left in the realm of uncertainty, it becomes void because of the fact that it is uncertain.

As the language in the bill now is, there is no rule whereby the difference can be ascertained. It does provide that the investigation shall be had. For what purpose? It does not provide for what purpose. The only purpose would be to ascertain the reason why the United States Government is taking upon itself a greater liability because of competition with foreign necessities—the articles that it is guaranteeing the price of here. That being true, the measure should provide a way to ascertain the difference in the cost of production, and the rule should be fixed certain in the bill and the duty added to the duty then existing, which should be the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home.

If my amendment is adopted, it will do that which it is sought to accomplish and make that certain which is uncertain. I do not think there should be any difference or division upon the proposition, for the only purpose is to make certain that which is uncertain. I therefore hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that with this amendment the Government would have first to investigate to find out what that difference would be. This is simply a temporary measure, and gives the Government the right to protect itself if these materials shall be on hand at the close of the war.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I can not now. So I think the gentleman's amendment ought not to be agreed to for that reason. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been limited and divided between certain Members.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman from Illinois yield back the balance of his time?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to speak, except that I thought the gentleman from Illinois would go more extensively into the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were 53 ayes and 73 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, is all time exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. No; several gentlemen, under the unanimous-consent agreement, have some time, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] is one of them. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 5, after the word "receipt," insert:

"Provided, That the investigations necessary, and reports required to be made, and services to be rendered under the provisions of this act shall be made by and through the Bureau of Mines, the Geological Department, and the Bureau of Markets and Quotations, as the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, shall direct."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman state his point of order or will he reserve it?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I will reserve it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to prevent the creation of a new department with a lot of new officers to carry out the provisions of this bill. The purpose of the bill principally is to discover where these secondary minerals exist. Another purpose is to develop them either by running the mines or entering into contracts for two years with the owners to purchase the minerals at a certain fixed price. One of the principal provisions in this bill is to prevent hoarding and manipulating or enhancing the price by combinations.

The United States Government has three well organized and equipped bureaus that can administer the provisions in this bill without a single new department being created or putting more public servants on the pay roll. We have now a Department of Mines and Mining.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the committee made this change to inspire confidence in the mining industries throughout the United States, and so that there would be no new organizations built up, and also because it would cost less money.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then why not say so in the bill? From the beginning to the end there is not a paragraph that refers to the Bureau of Mines, or any other department through which the provisions of this act shall be carried out.

Mr. FOSTER. They are all in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. COX. The Bureau of Markets is not.

Mr. ROBBINS. No; the Bureau of Markets is in the Department of Agriculture, and I provide by this amendment that, with the permission of the President, the Secretary can call on these departments for assistance in carrying out the operations of this bill.

I ask gentlemen to turn in the bill to a provision that has not yet been read. To show you that it is not the intention of those who put this bill in operation to confine it to the departments already organized, there is a provision in lines 11 and 12, page 19, section 20, that "such reports to the President shall, in addition to other matters, contain an account of all persons appointed or employed," the salary or compensation paid or allowed each, the aggregate amount of the different kinds of property, and so forth. The purpose of my amendment is to confine the work of that bureau to those already employed, and that there shall be no need of taking on a large number of new employees and pay them "salary or compensation" to enforce this bill. We have a properly equipped Bureau of Markets and Quotations now. More than that, the Mining Bureau now has 1,700 employees in it, an increase of 1,230 during the last year, and they are men who are skilled in discovering and analyzing the mineral wealth of the country. Then take the Geological Survey. I have some knowledge of that because in the matter of chrome I made an investigation to determine whether or not there was chrome in a certain part of the country. We get a part of the chrome that we already use here now and a part of our supply is imported, and I discovered that the Geological Survey had investigated the situation with reference to chrome and they know all about this and more of these other minerals. In the case of chrome we used 114,000 tons last year, and of this amount we produced 42,000 in the United States and imported 72,000 tons. The Geological Survey Bureau report that we have an abundance of this mineral that could be developed, and that if this bill is passed, to encourage the development of those small mines where this mineral is found, we will not need to import any more into this country. Why not use the Geological Survey for that purpose? Why create a new department with a lot of employees and a great number of officeholders to come here to fill up these numerous buildings that we are building down here on the Mall? We do not need them. The Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines and the Bureau of Markets will cover the whole field in the way of the discovery, development, and marketing of these secondary minerals.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman knows this is to be a brand-new bureau, to be known as the mineral administration?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; I do not. If that is the case, then I protest against it, and I offer this amendment for the purpose of preventing that very thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A letter that I have from the Director of the Bureau of Mines informs me that there will be created a mining administration, and that a letter that I have written will be referred to that administration when it is created by this bill.

Mr. COX. Is it to be separate and apart from the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is to be above it.

Mr. COX. And a new army of employees brought here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and it is to be known as the mineral administration.

Mr. ROBBINS. The purpose of my amendment is to prevent any such thing and to put these activities under the charge of the existing bureaus, to be carried on by the now constituted and established departments of the Federal Government.

If this amendment is adopted there will be no need to pay additional salaries to any of the employees now engaged in any of the three bureaus above named. The only expense the Government need pay out will be traveling expenses and cost of investigation. These employees will remain on the salary list just as they now are.

Moreover, the Government will secure the services of trained and experienced men who have attained their position under the civil service and who are by experience, education, and ability prepared to do this work, and the delay of organizing the new department of "mineral administration," as suggested by the gentleman from Washington, will be entirely unnecessary. The creation of new offices during this war has become very obnoxious to the American people. I wish to register my protest against this, and if the majority intend to favor economy in government, this is a chance to show their good faith by voting for this amendment.

Moreover, this means efficiency as well as economy. I intend to support this bill because many of these minerals are needed by the United States Government for use in this war.

In the case of manganese, which is required for the hardening and toughening of steel, we used 800,000 tons last year. Of this amount we imported 610,000 tons and produced the balance at home. This mineral exists extensively in the United States, and if proper protection is given and guaranteed to those engaged in its production, we can mine the entire amount required and release the ships that are engaged in that trade for use in the war.

Chrome is another product, as set forth above. We used 114,000 tons last year and produced 42,000 and imported 72,000. This mineral has recently been found, as it always is found, in the serpentine geological formation in Washington, Oregon, and southern Pennsylvania. The Geological Department has examined this deposit, and while this mineral only occurs in pockets they report it to exist in sufficient abundance within our own borders to supply our domestic requirements.

In fact it is believed that in southern Pennsylvania the deposit, which was worked with great profit from 1829 to 1848, can now be opened up again and made sufficiently productive to supply the entire needs of the United States.

This mineral, which could be produced in the United States at about $10 per ton, was found in Turkey, where men worked for 24 cents a day, and could be imported into the United States at a profit at $6 a ton. Hence our home producers, when the protection was taken off, were compelled to shut down and the mineral went out of existence as a home product, but with the war on to-day and importations from abroad almost cut off the price of the mineral has advanced from $10 a ton to $70 a ton, and with protection the domestic mines will be again opened and the price per ton brought down to a reasonable sum sufficient to pay good wages to the American workmen engaged in this industry and a fair remuneration will be given to the capital invested.

Chrome is one of the absolutely necessary minerals. It is used in hardening of steel, in tanning the buff leather used by our soldiers, in their shoes and leggings, and as one of the basic quantities of paint and for chemicals and drugs.

I am glad to see the Democratic Party willing to protect this industry and keep the money at home to pay wages to our own workmen that heretofore has been sent to Turkey and South Africa and paid to foreigners.

Tungsten is another metal that is absolutely necessary to toughen steel. It is found in large quantities in Colorado and Arizona. We used 90,000 tons of it last year and produced but one-half of it at home. We can produce it all under the protection given by this bill.

I might go over the whole 45 precious or secondary minerals mentioned in this bill, and with but few exceptions it is possible to develop and produce all of these within the United States or Alaska that we require for domestic consumption and our war activities.

Mr. Chairman, I look on this bill as one of the most important pieces of legislation we have yet considered. It is absolutely necessary. I am heartily in favor of it. It is a step in the right direction, taken, alas, too late; but better taken now than omitted longer.

Every particle of steel that is used in our arms and in our munitions, for fine work, requires one or the other of these metals, depending on whether they are to be hardened like armor plate or toughened like the frames of automobiles, trucks, or airplanes

I shall cast my vote for this bill most willingly and enthusiastically as a war measure; that, however, is the only reason I support it. I look for great good to our country and its resources from this protective feature and its complete operation.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is not germane; that it is proposed to put it into three different departments not named in the bill, one of them being from the Agricultural Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, if there is to be any debate upon it I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I will renew the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. But I just want to save debate upon it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let us have a vote upon it. We will vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is to be any debate I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There undoubtedly will be debate upon the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I would like to withdraw it. Let us vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order, then, is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROBBINS) there were—ayes 38, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 5, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment upon which I will not consume my whole five minutes. The first part of section 14 now under consideration is what is regarded as the guaranty part of the section. The limit of time fixed upon the guaranty as reported by the committee in the bill is placed at two years. My amendment proposes to fix the limitation at only one year. Now, gentlemen of the committee, I am unable to understand why the mining industry of this country should have its proceeds guaranteed for two years when the House, in the Agricultural bill, recently overwhelmingly defeated a proposition to guarantee to the farmers the price on the wheat for a period of two years. Again, I do not know and no other person knows when the war may possibly end. From the newspaper reports it strikes me that Germany is endeavoring for a decision this summer. Whether they are going to be successful in it or not I do not know, and no other person knows. But why do you want to fasten upon the Treasury of the United States a guaranty for two years? Why do you want to saddle upon the Treasury of the United States a proposition to take $50,000,000 out of the Treasury and guarantee in all human probability to a lot of owners of defunct mines of this country a fixed price upon their commodities? Why do you not guarantee it for one year and then, under the same rules and regulations fixed by the President wherein and whereby he guaranteed the price of wheat from year to year, let him guarantee the price of these commodities from year to year. In other words, gentlemen, my proposition proposes to fix a limitation for one year, leaving all the power in the hands of the President exactly as fixed in the bill instead of fixing the limitation at two years. This amendment ought to carry.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman understands, of course, that the language of the bill is not to exceed two years, and in the judgment of the Secretary or President he may limit it to one year. Then the gentleman understands further, does he not, that sometimes it requires a great deal of time to open up and develop a mine and get the machinery installed and to operate it, and if we are seeking to encourage, which we are, these small mines which are not very much developed yet, one year's time would hardly give time to operate at all under the guaranty.

Mr. COX. I can not agree with the gentleman upon that proposition. It takes quite a period of time to open up wheat fields and prepare them also.

Mr. HAMLIN. They are opened up already.

Mr. COX. No; they have got to buy new machinery from year to year and——

Mr. DEMPSEY. But the gentleman recognizes the fact that the wheat crop is an annual crop?

Mr. COX. So is the production of the mines an annual crop, a daily crop.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The wheat fields are yielding from year to year, whereas——

Mr. COX. So do the mines of all kinds.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Whereas a mine may take more than one year to get it to producing at all.

Mr. COX. Oh, that is begging the question again. I put the question squarely up here. Do you want to give the mine men a guaranty of two years, when one year is sufficient? It is all that is needed. I do not propose to jeopardize the Treasury of the United States by fixing a limitation of two years when one year will bring all the results that are needed to stimulate production.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes; for a question.

Mr. FESS. Page 14, line 16, I see the word "seasonable" is used. What is the meaning of "seasonable" in mining?

Mr. COX. I do not know.

Mr. FESS. I would understand what it was in raising wheat, but I do not understand what it was with reference to mining.

Mr. FOSTER. They can not mine at certain places during certain seasons of the year. That is about it, and they go out and work at something else part of the year and then go back when they can operate the mines. That is all there is to it.

Mr. COX. Now, I think this amendment ought to carry and save the Treasury of the United States all that can be saved under a bill that no one is for. Yet all will vote for it.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to oppose this particular amendment?

Mr. GARLAND. I do. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the amendment should pass. There are a great many of these metals that take a long time to develop, and to fix a stated time of one year is not at all like growing wheat. I rose, however, to send to the desk a clipping from this morning's Washington Post which bears on the situation in my estimation relative to this bill, and is I believe a very good reason why this bill should quickly pass. And I ask the Clerk to read it in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 29, 1918.]

GERMANS PROPOSE BOYCOTT—TRADE COMBINE AIMS TO CONTROL RAW MATERIALS IN WORLD-WIDE BELT.

CHRISTIANIA, April 28.

A number of great German and Austro-Hungarian concerns, including the German Oriental Co. the North German Lloyd Steamship Co., and the Lohmans, has formed a huge combine, to be known as the "Europaesche Handelsgeselischaft," at Bremen to control and centralize the import trade in war products of all kinds and in raw materials from Russia, Persia, Mancharia, China, Turkestan, Roumania, and Finland.

It is intended to organize a union of all exporters in these countries who had prewar business relations with Germany and to exclude neutrals who deal with entente countries from all products handled and from all commerce with the central powers.

It is purposed also to organize a boycott and undermine the financial and commercial position of proentente neutrals and to form in the central powers a commercial bloc, which will include friendly neutrals. Officially, the combine will liquidate one year after peace is signed, but will continue unofficially.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield back any time that may be remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to know whom that comes from?

Mr. GARLAND. That came from a newspaper of this morning.

Mr. CANNON. Is that all? Just a newspaper?

Mr. GARLAND. It did. Clippings from newspapers are put in here in evidence from time to time.

Mr. CANNON. I just wondered if the man who wrote it had been drunk the night before.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] desire to use his time?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not until the next section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] desire to use his time now?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE] is recognized.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the expressed purpose of this bill. My observations will relate largely to bromine—one of the most important products referred to. It has been my privilege to acquire information upon this subject which leads me to tell the House that it will be unnecessary in encouraging the production of bromine to expend a single dollar of the fifty millions proposed to be appropriated by this bill.

BROMINE AND BROMIDES.

It may be interesting for the House to know that in Michigan—and, I am proud to say, at my home town of Midland and westward to Mount Pleasant—is located the greatest bromide industry in the world, save possibly the exception of Germany. There bromine is extracted from bromine-bearing rock. In this country it is extracted from bromine-bearing brine. This brine is obtained from wells 1,200 to 1,400 feet deep. Brine may be rich in chlorine, calcium, magnesium, or other properties, yet not contain sufficient bromine to warrant extraction, so the important factor is to locate a place where the brine has a high bromine content. In this respect nature has favored the Michigan district.

The importance of bromine in prosecuting the war can hardly be overstated. It is divulging no military secret for me to say that bromine is used principally in the manufacture of war gases, and in some bombardments now as many gas shells are used as high-explosive shells. Bromides are produced from bromine and consist of a combination of bromine and either sodium, potassium, strontium, or ammonium. Bromides are famed for their medicinal value. Eminent physicians in the hospitals at the front have recently discovered in bromides the most effective cure in shell-shock cases.

This bill seeks to encourage production in the United States of essential products, and we applaud the avowed purpose. For years the Republican Party has contended for this very principle. It realized long ago that sound economic policy demanded the production in America of every essential product that could be produced here. In times of peace it meant a greater American market and that American dollars might be spent at home. In times of war it means that this country should be as nearly self-supporting as possible. The protective tariff upbuilded the industries of this country and makes us the powerful factor in this war. For this industrial preparedness the Nation owes it to the wisdom and foresight of Republicans, who protected American industries. [Applause on Republican side.] The tariff saved for America its great bromide industry of to-day. A few years ago, when Germany saw this industry threatening her supremacy in the bromide world, she backed her bromine syndicate with the "yellow-dog fund" and by every unfair means sought to crush competition. The Germans paid a substantial tariff and actually sold bromides here for three years at less than the cost of production in Germany. Nevertheless it was this constant drain of her finances into the Treasury of the United States and the matchless ingenuity of an American chemist that saved the day for our bromide industry.

Herbert H. Dow, head of that great chemical institution which bears his name (The Dow Chemical Co.), after years of research, learned how to liberate bromine by electrolysis—passing of an electric current through the brine. The economy of the Dow process, together with the protection afforded by the tariff, made it possible for this industry to withstand the German attack. It pleases me to tell you that in the Midland district there are being produced 2,000,000 pounds of bromides annually—more than enough to supply the entire requirements of this country during normal times; and with Government aid already decided upon, within six months this production will be increased by one-half. Not one single dollar of the fifty million proposed by this bill need be spent to assure this country of an adequate supply of bromine. The country may thank a protective tariff and the pluck and ingenuity of Herbert H. Dow for wresting from the Germans world monopoly in bromine.

INDIGO AND INDIGOIDS.

Permit me to suggest to the committee that dyestuffs should be added to the essential products named in this bill. Prior to the war 90 per cent of all dyestuffs came from Germany. In this country we use annually 9,000,000 pounds of indigo alone. About 5 per cent of this is natural indigo, and the remainder is synthetic. There are hundreds of varieties. Our late and distinguished Member from Connecticut, Mr. Hill, introduced a bill in the Sixty-fourth Congress providing a substantial tariff for dyestuffs. Enterprising American chemical manufacturers appeared before Congress promising to produce the full requirements of this Nation if afforded protection until this industry could be established sufficiently to withstand German competition. But when this bill passed Congress in September, 1916, it contained an amendment relieving from the 5 cents per pound specific duty "indigo and all indigoids * * *." I do not want to be understood as saying that Germany influenced the insertion of this amendment, and if it did, no Member of Congress was aware of it; but I do say that German interests are now concerned in having that provision remain unchanged.

Members of the American Chemical Society, advocating the repeal of this amendment, urged that it might be construed to even permit German sulphur dyes to escape duty; but strange as it may seem, it remained for a professor in a great American University to answer this argument, and by inference at least urge that this amendment be retained. When the assignors to Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik, of Ludwigshafen-on-the-Rhine, applied for a certain patent at the United States Patent Office, they referred to this same professor as a leading authority and attached his statement to their claims. It is an established fact, too, that one of the chemists of the Badische Co., of New York, was instrumental with the university professor in allaying the fears of those who were concerned for the future of our chemical industry.

This statement by me is based upon an editorial appearing in the Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, which is quite lengthy, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting it.

[Reprinted from the Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, vol. 9, No. 4, p. 332, April, 1917.]

AGAIN I SAY, "AMERICA FOR AMERICANS."

In our last issue we announced the policy of always being willing to publish criticisms of matter appearing in this Journal, with the further statement that those so criticized would be given opportunity to reply. With complete willingness we include ourselves among those subject to criticism, at the same time reserving to ourselves the same privilege of reply.

On the evening of March 9 I was handed the following communication in person by Prof. Alexander Smith, head of the department of chemistry in Columbia University and a past president of the American Chemical Society, with the request that it be published in this Journal.

CRITICISMS OF CHEMICAL LEGISLATION WHICH ARE NOT WISE, BUT OTHERWISE.

(By Alexander Smith.)

The editorials in this Journal and the reports of addresses by the editor, Dr. Herty, have called the attention of chemists, and all interested in chemistry, to the wording of one paragraph of the tariff bill of September, 1916, in which the dyes relieved from the 5 per cent per pound tax are specified. The classes mentioned include "* * * natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids whether or not obtained from indigo * * *." My purpose is not to discuss the matters of public policy involved in these exemptions, but simply to call attention to a serious error in the arguments used by the critics of the section in question.

Dr. Herty refers to Nietzki's Chemie der Organischen Farbstoffe, and says, "That if our chemists did not know what 'indigoids' were, Prof. Nietzki did know. In the fifth edition (1906) I found the group of dyes known as 'indigoids' completely specified. The list included all forms of sulphur dyes."

Now no argument is really supported by a misrepresentation of the facts, although in this instance the misrepresentation was entirely unconscious and unintentional. In 1906 Nietzki did not know what "indigoids" were, because the word does not occur in the book, and was in fact first introduced to the science two years later by Friedländer (Ber., 41 (1908), 772) in a paper entitled "On Indigoid Dyestuffs." In 1896, aside from some halogen derivatives of indigo, and one or two dyes related to indigo and found in natural indigo, practically no dyes closely related to indigo were known and there was no need for a class name. The invention of thio-indigo red in 1905 was followed by the production of a large number of substituted indigoes, all of which contained the chromogenic group —CO—C=C—CO—, and so in 1908 the term "indigoid" was suggested to cover the members of this group. Authoritative works (Cain-Thorpe, The Synthetic Dyestuffs, 1913, 174; Green, Analysis of Dyestuffs, 1915, 123 and 38; Thorpe, Dictionary of Applied Chemistry, 1912, 3, 130; Wahl, L'industrie des Matières Colorantes Organiques, 1912, 317, 346) now all mention indigoids, and define them as indicated above, and the definition in every one of these books absolutely excludes the possibility that any chemist could even think of sulphur colors in the same connection. Numerous other references could be given to show that the word "indigoid" is always used with the meaning stated above. It is sufficient to quote Thorpe:

"Indigoids.—The congeners of indigo may be divided into two different classes. One of them contains the true derivatives of indigo, in which one or more of the eight hydrogen atoms of the two phenylene groups are replaced by other substituents; the other embraces substances which are strictly analogous to indigo in their constitution, but different from it in the construction of the complex connecting the two phenylene groups, which in this case as well as in that of indigo may have their hydrogen atoms replaced by other substituents. An enormous variety of new dyestuffs may thus be synthesized, all of which contain the characteristic chromophoric group of indigo: —CO—C=C—CO—."

An examination of Nietzki's book shows clearly that he distinguishes between sulphur dyes and indigo dyes, for he divides dyes into 13 classes, and places the former in Class X and the latter in Class XII, and uses this classification consistently. Dr. Herty's misunderstanding seems to have arisen from a superficial examination of a more condensed classification occurring in Nietzki's volume. In one place he mentions five classes determined solely by the properties used in dyeing, namely (1) basic colors, (2) acid dyestuffs, (3) mordant dyestuffs, (4) neutral or salt dyestuffs, and (5) an unnamed group which includes insoluble dyestuffs, such as indigo, certain azo-dyestuffs, and the sulphur dyestuffs. But he does not say, or even imply that these dyes—mostly vat dyes—are similar to indigo, but only that the sulphur dyes do not belong to the other four classes, and he does not use the term indigoids, because that term did not then exist. These are simply a somewhat heterogeneous collection of dyes, which do not belong to the first four classes. Furthermore, an examination of Nietzki's book shows that he would have felt grossly insulted if anyone had stated that he classed sulphur dyes with indigo dyes. He not only puts them in separate classes, but on page 291 he defines sulphur colors on the basis of the method of manufacture, and on page 295 gives their general properties. On page 325 he says, "Indigo dyestuffs are all derivatives of indol C_8H_7N," and not one of the sulphur colors he mentions in Class X, thiazol and sulphur dyestuffs (p. 288, et seq.) is derived from indol. There is, therefore, no possibility that anyone would include a sulphur brown as an "indigoid," either on the basis of anything Nietzki says, or on the definition of indigoids now found in many recent authoritative works, for these definitions absolutely exclude any such interpretation.

Dr. Herty seems to think that Mr. Caesar Cone, who died on March 1, 1917, and can not now make any reply, caused the introduction of the word "indigoids," and did so with the deliberate intention of widening the exempted group so as to make it include sulphur dyes. Since the word "indigoid" is a purely scientific term, and is not used as a trade classification, there is no reason to suppose Mr. Cone ever heard of the word before it appeared in the act. All who knew Mr. Cone personally are well aware that he would never have been guilty of using a subterfuge of this description. The introduction of the word indigoids is easily explicable in an entirely different way. In a case (Treasury Decisions, 36450, 30, No. 23, 11–15 (June 8, 1916), and 36965, 32, No. 5, 64–67 (Feb. 1, 1917)) tried before the general appraisers, and reversed by the court of appeals, the word "indigoids" made its first appearance in connection with the chemical trade. Its introduction into the act was undoubtedly based on this case.

A reading of the two reports shows that the act of 1913, paragraph 514, places "indigo and dyes obtained from indigo" on the free list. The lower court decided that dyes chemically similar to indigo (such as thio-indigos) and made from the same fundamental substances, but not made from finished indigo itself, were covered by this exemption. The higher court reversed this decision, claiming that the act applied only to dyes made with indigo as one stage in the actual manufacture.

Incidentally, the indigoid group is also defined in the report by references to Thorpe's Dictionary, in a way that excludes all dyes not containing the characteristic indigo chromogenic group. The new act differs from the old, therefore, in the fact that chemical cousins of indigo, now known as indigoids, even if not made from indigo itself, are included in the exemption. But there is not the slightest possibility of the word indigoid being interpreted so as to cover any dyes not actually containing the indigo chromogenic group.

When Prof. Smith handed me this communication in an envelope bearing the printed inscription "Columbia University, in the City of New York, Department of Chemistry," I confess I was surprised, for, as far as I could remember, he had never published an article before in the field of industrial chemistry. This surprise was largely increased when I learned that the communication was on the subject of dyestuffs.

I have been pretty closely associated with every stage of the fight for an American dyestuff industry, have followed the discussions in all available journals, and, through the aid of clipping bureaus, have followed closely the discussions in the daily press. Never before had I seen or heard of anything written or spoken by Prof. Smith on this subject. This surprise, however, was increased to amazement when I first read the above communication. Let me explain.

The title of Prof. Smith's article is a paraphrase of an article which I wrote for the Annual Review of the New York Journal of Commerce, published on February 5, 1917, which article was reproduced in the March, 1917, issue of this journal, as a part of my editorial "America for Americans." In his opening sentence above, Prof. Smith states, "The editorials in this journal, etc." I have written only two on this subject, so it is evident that Prof. Smith has seen the one containing the Journal of Commerce article.

In his second paragraph he quotes me, and strange to say, in a contribution to a scientific journal he gives no reference as to the source of the quoted matter. This is a curious oversight for one so accustomed to publication as he is. As a matter of fact, he quoted sentences written by Mr. Isaac Russell, a reporter of the New York Evening Mail, who, after a 15-minute interview with me one day in my office and having no knowledge of chemistry or German and with only a few rough notes written on a piece of paper not larger than an ordinary envelope, wrote a three-quarter column story about indigoids and tariff legislation, which was printed in the Evening Mail of January 31, 1917.

Reading the story, I felt that Mr. Russell had done a pretty good piece of reportorial work for so technical a subject, and was gratified to note that in recording my discussion of the subject he did not use quotation marks, for there were a number of errors in his article. Knowing that the evening newspaper public would not be interested in a correction of such inaccuracies of chemistry and of German translation, I determined to put the matter straight before those who would be interested in such matters, and so tore up the partly written article on "Chemical legislation: Wise and otherwise," which I had been requested to write for the Journal of Commerce and wrote instead the article referring only to dyestuff legislation under the modified title, "Chemical legislation: Not wise but otherwise." Thus, I gave over my own signature my views, for which I would therefore be solely and entirely responsible.

Among the inaccuracies of the reportorial statements were those quoted by Prof. Smith. I did not make such statements. Prof. Smith's unctuous sentence, "Although in this instance the misrepresentation was entirely unconscious and unintentional" smacks of insincerity, for the merest tyro in chemistry could not have made such statements if they were "unintentional."

What I did say over my own signature was, "If a poll were taken of the dyestuff consumers in the United States as to what is an 'indigoid' which is 'not derived from indigo,' how many could answer the question definitely?" and, further, that I had failed to receive an answer from "five of the most prominent American dyestuff chemists." I further stated that from information received there was good ground to believe that effort would be made to bring in sulphur dyes without payment of the special duty and that the basis of the effort would be the classification in the fifth edition of Nietzki's book. I did not seek to justify any such contention. I did refer to the misfortune that would befall the American dyestuff industry if such a contention should be sustained by the board of appraisers. I certainly hope that it would not be so sustained, but that does not affect the intention of the importer who had determined to test the matter.

It was a public duty to call attention to this intended move against the revenue of the country and the American dyestuff industry. Regardless, however, of anybody's views as to 'indigoids not obtained from indigo,' one thing is certain—if Congress would repeal that excepting clause, no test cases of sulphur dyes could ever arise, and that is the point for which all who are interested in the American industry should struggle. "Safety first" fits this case.

From the mere reading of Prof. Smith's communication I fail to see its purpose. Many things suggest that the natural thing for Prof. Smith to have done would have been to tell me frankly of his researches in the meaning of indigoids and to advise that I publish a correction. This would have enabled me to clear up his misunderstanding of the situation. Instead he hands me a paper fully prepared, with the request that it be published in this journal, of which I am the editor.

Does he seek to safeguard the American industry? If so, he should reserve his ammunition for the board of appraisers and aid the Government attorneys should the case arise. Was it to exhibit great learning in this popular field? If so, he seeks notoriety in a way which is extremely unusual, to say the least. Does he seek to bolster up the cause of the importers by allaying discussion of a matter which might sweep away with it indigo alizarin, and the other excepted dyes, or by lulling us into a false sense of security?

I regret to harbor the last thought, but am impelled to it by the unexpected defense which he makes of the late Mr. Cæsar Cone's motives. Mr. Cone made no secret of his position in this matter. In the brief of the Proximity Manufacturing Co. (Mr. Cone's company) to the Senate Committee on Finance, filed last July, these words occur: "And we respectfully submit that the second paragraph of section 401 should be amended by adding: 'and natural and synthetic alizarin, and dyes obtained from alizarin, anthracene and carbazol; and natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids, whether or not obtained from indigo, shall be returned to the free list and shall be exempt from duty.'"

Again, in an address by Mr Cone before the National Association of Garment Manufacturers at St. Louis, Mo., on November 16, 1916 (a printed copy of which is before me bearing the imprint of Harrison Printing Co., Greensboro, N. C.), Mr. Cone said (p. 10 of this address): "Now while we are on this dyestuff question—I don't know whether you gentlemen know it or not, but I have been personally vilified somewhat by some of my friends because I was the only man, the only manufacturer in the United States that attempted to oppose the duty that they have put upon certain dyestuffs, and particularly on indigo. * * * On the 8th or 9th of September a bill was passed putting a duty of 30 per cent on indigo, and any indigo that comes to this country now bears that duty, and I dare say that it would have been 30 per cent plus 5 cents a pound but for the efforts made by my attorney and myself in Washington. And I thought at one time that I was going to be successful in keeping that 30 per cent off." Engaging frankness, amounting even to a boast. His own words confirm completely every statement I have ever made concerning Mr. Cone and this legislation.

Now, if there is a joker in this tariff bill I have never thought that Mr. Cone was primarily responsible for it; he was not a chemist. There is good ground, however, for a reasonable inference at this date that if this discussion continues a little longer we shall know who is responsible for it.

Meanwhile more light is thrown on Prof. Smith's remarkable contribution by a chain of interesting events which have happened recently. On February 7 a card was mailed to me from E. D. Lee, librarian of the chemistry reading room of Columbia University, requesting me to return the volume of Nietzki's which I had taken out on Prof. Metzger's card. Returning from Washington, D. C., on the 10th, the volume was immediately returned. Then arose the following correspondence:

Mr. CHARLES H. HERTY,
Editor Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry,
Forty-first Street and Madison Avenue, New York.

DEAR SIR: In the Textbe Record of February 2, I read the article mentioning that in the fifth edition of Nietzki the group of dyes known as indigoids is completely specified and that the list includes all forms of sulphur dyes.

This classification of sulphur dyes being quite new to me, I tried to find the information about indigoids, but after getting hold finally of the above-mentioned book and looking all over it, I can not find it.

I would appreciate very much if you would write me the exact page of Nietzki dealing with this matter.

It may interest you to know that I have, however, found an exact definition of indigoids in the following textbooks:

The Synthetic Dyestuffs, etc., by Cain Thorpe.
The Manufacture of Organic Dyestuffs, by Wahl.
Analysis of Dyestuffs, by Green.
And also in Dictionary of Applied Chemistry, by Thorpe.

Sincerely, yours,

(Signed) Dr. H. MEYER.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of February 23, I beg to refer you to the two concluding paragraphs of the introductory chapter, fifth edition, of Nietzki's "Chemie der Organischen Farbstoffe," page 27.

March 2, 1917.

Mr. CHARLES H. HERTY,
Editor Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry,
Forty-first Street and Madison Avenue, New York.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of February 26, and wish to thank you for your information.

In going over the two paragraphs on page 27 of Nietzki's Chemie der Organischen Farbstoffe, fifth edition, I can, however, not find anything about sulphur dyes being "indigoids." Nietzki, after giving the four groups of dyestuffs, namely, I Basic, II Acid, III Mordant, and IV Neutral or salt dyestuffs, puts in a fifth group all the colors which do not belong to any of these four groups, and on account of their unsolubility have to be produced direct on the fiber, and mentions as examples indigo, insoluble azo dyestuffs, and also sulphur dyestuffs, but I do not think it says that sulphur dyestuffs belong to the indigo class; it would then be just as correct to call indigo a sulphur dyestuff.

Sincerely, yours,

(Signed) Dr. H. MEYER.

As the two letters from Dr. H. Meyer were written on paper without letterhead, and as I had never even heard of anyone in Pelham Manor, I did not care to continue such a discussion and so simply filed the letters. A few days later, however, I was somewhat interested to learn that a Dr. H. Meyer was a chemist of the Badische Co., at 128 Duane Street, New York City.

On the 9th of March Prof. Smith handed me his communication. I was at once struck by the similarity of literature references to definitions of indigoids given by him and by Dr. Meyer in his letter of February 23 and a somewhat similar treatment by both of Nietzki's "condensed classification," as Prof. Smith alliteratively describes it.

A few days later I was interested to learn that on June 30, 1913, an application for a patent on "producing hydrogen" (U. S. Patent 1,115,770, issued Nov. 3, 1914) was filed by Carl Bosch and Wilhelm Wild, of Ludwigshafen-on-the-Rhine, Germany, assignors to Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik, of Ludwigshafen-on-the-Rhine, Germany, a corporation of Baden. The assignment was executed June 12, 1913, and recorded June 30, 1913. On July 3, 1914, the United States Patent Office, Division 31, received a communication labeled Paper No. 3 (a certified copy of which is before me), in which was recorded certain amendments to the patent and the substitution of new claims for the original claims. The paper further gives what the attorneys of these applicants assert to be a report "of Prof. Alexander Smith, of Columbia University, a leading authority, and who has reported as follows:" Here follows what purports to be from a report by Prof. Smith. I shall not take the space in this Journal to publish it unless these statements are questioned. This was the first definite knowledge I had of a direct connection of Prof. Smith with the Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik.

With some light gained yet still puzzling over the meaning of all of this, I finally referred to Mr. Isaac Russell, the Evening Mail reporter who had written the first interview on this subject, the letters of inquiry sent to me by Dr. H. Meyer. I told Mr. Russell he would probably find Dr. Meyer with the Badische Co., at 128 Duane Street. Mr. Russell thanked me and said he would seek an interview with him and bring out the fact that there appeared to be definitions of indigoids not made from indigo which made the tariff revision, as drawn, perfectly safe. On March 21, Mr. Russell informed me that he visited the offices of the Badische Co., at 128 Duane Street, and found that Dr. H. Meyer was out; he was informed, however, that Dr. Meyer lived at Pelham Manor and could be reached by telephone at the number given in the Westchester section of the telephone directory. This number shows the address 671 James Street, thus agreeing with the address given on Dr. Meyer's letters to me. On March 22 Mr. Russell appeared at my office. He reported that he had been to the Badische Co.'s offices and met Dr. Meyer.

Instead of giving him an interview Dr. Meyer said, as Mr. Russell reported to me, "I think you had better not take this up in the newspapers. It is a technical chemical subject, and it had better be settled by the chemists and college professors in the chemical journals. A chemical journal is soon to appear with an article on this subject by a professor." Mr. Russell further said that Dr. Meyer had referred him to me as editor of the paper in which the article was to appear. Mr. Russell asked me for a copy of this article out of which to make an article for the Evening Mail as a follow-up to the first Mail article. He said he had told Dr. Meyer he would go to me for a copy of the article and use it in lieu of the interview which Dr. Meyer had declined. He said Dr. Meyer approved this idea. I declined to give Mr. Russell a copy of this article as the galley proof of Prof. Smith's article had not yet been sent to him.

This article by Prof. Smith, about which Dr. Meyer was so well posted, is the only communication I have received on this subject. To my mind all of this establishes with reasonable certainty a Smith-Meyer-Badische connection and all that goes with it.

Only one thing more—all of the rest of us have been fighting to build up an American dyestuff industry, not simply as an economic necessity, but because we know how closely related this industry is to the production of high explosives for our Army and Navy.

Meanwhile, during the progress of the details recorded in this reply, our country has been drawn daily nearer and nearer into war with Germany, and even to-day when most of us hold strongly the conviction that we are already at war with Germany, Prof. Smith telephoned at noon to the office of this Journal to learn whether his communication would be published in the April issue and was seemingly gratified to be assured that it would.

Again I say, "America for Americans!"

CHAS. H. HERTY.

March 22, 1917.

If there is one industry more than another closely allied with modern war preparation it is the chemical industry. Germany has long sought supremacy in this line; and we are shortsighted indeed if encouragement of any sort is withheld from this industry. And in this connection permit me to say that the Bureau of Mines is doing wonderful work.

My reason for speaking upon bromine and indigo is that I have had an unusual opportunity to gain information upon these subjects. You will therefore pardon my reference again to that Midland industry—The Dow Chemical Co.—but I am certain that Congress will be interested to know that in spite of many obstacles this company is now producing at the rate of 1,500,000 pounds annually—one-sixth of the Nation's entire requirements—and within six months this capacity will be doubled. It is the only concern in America to-day manufacturing indigo. Another great concern will soon be manufacturing it, and shortly the entire requirements of the United States will be produced right here in our own country. But if the war should end in the near future—and this is the prayer of humanity—Germany, with its great factories, experience, and Government aid would be able to crush this industry if the law remains unchanged. Our ambition should be, so far as economically possible, to produce in this country every essential product, and we should be doubly anxious and certain that never again will we be found dependent upon Germany for anything. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. In line 3, on page 17, the word "use" should be changed to the word "used," and in line 4 the word "miscellaneous" is spelled wrong. I ask that those corrections be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the corrections as indicated will be made.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of any of these necessaries is essential in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of necessaries, or that the national security and defense will be subserved thereby, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked all persons shall, after a reasonable time prescribed in such notice, conform to the order providing such limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction. Any person who willfully violates the provisions of this section, or who shall violate any rule or regulation made under this section, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before the reading of the next paragraph begins I would like to know if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] intends to go further to-night? There may be some discussion on section 15.

Mr. FOSTER. No. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for six days, for the purpose of making liberty-loan speeches.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the mining bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 30, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 30, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we take Thy name upon our lips and bow reverently before Thee that we may gain Thy favor and be kept this day in the embrace of Thy loving care. As Thou hast sent us into the world to make the world safe for freemen to live in, as Thou hast called us to give the supremacy to right over might, we pray that this day we may be enabled to subject the physical to the spiritual and raise the standard of righteousness both in our lives and in the life of the Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1918, when, on request of Mr. JONES of Washington and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

THE YANKTON SIOUX V. THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 1070).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, pursuant to law, a certified copy of the findings of fact, with an opinion of the court, per curiam, of December 3, 1917, in the case of the Yankton Sioux Indians against The United States, No. 31253, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have a memorial from the mayor and city council of the city of Tacoma, Wash., calling attention to the fact that the United States is urging a minimum use of wheat, and to the further fact that by reason of this and the use of substitutes prices have been very greatly increased for the substitutes. They ask that some branch of the Government be vested with authority to take care of this situation. The memorialists close their memorial as follows:

> The spirit of the people at large is loyal to the point of any needed sacrifice, but food is essential to life. In this as in all things affecting the life of the Nation the common people ask only the application of the recognized American principle: A square deal.

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I present a memorial of the Woman's Foreign and Home Missionary Societies of the Methodist Church of Vermilion, S. Dak., protesting against the use of grain and sugar in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD without the names.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VERMILION, S. DAK., April 3, 1918.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

We, the members of the Woman's Foreign and Home Missionary Societies of the Methodist Church of Vermilion, S. Dak., do solemnly protest against the enormous waste of grain and sugar used in the manufacture of malt liquors in the United States, and we respectfully ask that this waste be stopped.

We are proud of our State in the stand she has taken, and we wish to help our sister States and the Nation in nation-wide prohibition and to help feed its defenders and save our country and our people to their liberty. The housewives are gladly cooperating with the Food Administration to feed our soldiers and our allies, and in their interests and the interests of the home and the people of the United States we repectfully ask that the manufacture and sale of malt and spirituous liquors be discontinued.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted by Monticello Grange, No. 6, Patrons of Husbandry, of Pinebluff, Wyo., favoring the fixing of prices on commodities and utensils used in the agricultural industry, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have been requested to present to the Senate the following resolution, which was passed unanimously by the executive council of the National American Woman Suffrage Association at a special meeting held in Indianapolis April 17, 1918. The executive council consists of the presidents of the State auxiliaries of the national association in the 48 States, and the resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas America is fighting for the right of self-government for the people of Europe while one-half the people of America are denied that right; and
> Whereas the ideal of democracy can be defended with increased zeal abroad if it be given practical application at home; and
> Whereas the votes of the loyal women of America are needed as never before to sustain American ideals at the polls while our men fight for American ideals in the trenches; and
> Whereas, country by country, all Europe is recognizing woman suffrage as a war measure fundamental to democracy, British women, Danish women, Icelandic women, Russian women, all having been enfranchised since the war began: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That we women, in executive council assembled, call on the Senate of the United States to pass the Federal suffrage amendment, to the end that America may be strengthened in the fight for democracy abroad by the added strength of her democracy at home; and be it further
> Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Member of the Senate and to the President of the United States.

Mr. President, this resolution, it seems to me, emphasizes the inconsistency of our position in fighting for democracy and at the same time denying to one-half the people of the United States the right to participate in government.

If the Declaration of Independence is true when it says that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, it seems to me we can not consistently contend for the establishment of democracy in other nations as long as we deny it in our own.

The verity of this fundamental principle of democracy was thought to be so clear and conclusive that in the same instrument it was declared to be a self-evident truth—that is, one that is not the subject of question or dispute. How, then, can we justly deny to our own mothers, sisters, wives, and daughters the right to pass upon the laws that shall govern all?

Mr. President, the resolution further shows that this is a world question. It is not one confined to a State or to the United States. It shows that it is agitating the people of all nations; that it is an evolution in government; that it is proceeding with certainty in its determination in favor of the rights of humanity. Let us end this inconsistency and enthuse all of our people by adopting the joint resolution for a constitutional amendment granting equal suffrage to all of the governed of our States and Nation.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, for some time I have thought of introducing a few letters out of the number which I have received upon a subject of very great importance to the country. I take this occasion to introduce them, as to-morrow the Senate will have before it the so-called sedition bill, and I think these communications bear somewhat directly upon that subject. I submit the communications and ask that they be read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not understand just what is to go into the RECORD.

Mr. FRANCE. If the Senator will give me a few minutes, I will explain the nature of the communications.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator wants to have some letters read?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. As a part of his remarks.

Mr. OVERMAN. All right. I could not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. FRANCE. I ask that they be read, and I wish to say just a few words in connection with their presentation.

Mr. President, I confess that I have been profoundly disturbed by the course of our recent debates upon the sedition bill. Had I not come to know something of the minds and, I trust, something of the hearts of certain of my colleagues here whose words have so distressed me, I should have been forced to come to the conclusion that they had lost faith in the Republic and in the loyalty of her people.

There are spies here. In every warring country there must be spies. Mercenary spies are the foul and filthy vultures and harpies of war. But if such spies there be who attend or read the debates of this Senate, I say to them count not words spoken here in overzeal against those foolish ones who in this hour speak with contempt or ridicule when we mistake in putting on our unaccustomed armor. Go tell your Kaiser to look beyond the western line where stand the serried ranks of the heroic French and British hosts, and far beyond the point where from his high vantage ground he first saw the flag of this Republic flying gallantly and defiantly amid the storm and roar of his artillery, and far beyond the sea to the western horizon of the world, and bid him there behold what is written upon the western skies; for with the hand of this Republic it is written that his kingdom has been numbered and that here is an end to his autocracy, for through America and through a new and more comprehensive and cooperative democracy the people of the world are at last coming to their own. Go tell your Kaiser that it is a powerful hand when it shall be fully clenched and mailed, that the arm is unwithered, and that the mighty loins of the Republic girding now for battle—a Republic of a hundred million freemen whose blood is uncorrupted by sedition and untainted by treason—possess a power unbending and invincible, even though she may be somewhat awkward in this first putting on of her habiliments of war. She will be an adversary against whom his legions will dash and break in vain, for the young Republic has a great, loyal, lion heart, soon to be incased, full armored in gold and steel, and even yet upon these and, more than all, thrice armed in the eternal justice of her cause.

Mr. President, while we were for days debating a treason and sedition bill to place a gag and a rough hand upon the lips of the American people, I have been hearing from all parts of our country, to use your own most apt expression, men "Crying out to the Republic, 'What wilt thou have me to do?'"

I know that in my national organization or man-power bill I had proposed what seemed a drastic measure. It is quite natural that it should seem to be radical to attempt to transform a great free Republic for the time being into a "Nation in arms," and yet when my plan was given some publicity, particularly by the New York Times, I received from every section of our great country, and from those in different stations of life unknown before to me, words of encouragement and approbation. From New England they came, from the far South, from the Southwest and West, and even from Alaska, stretching away in her magnificent distances beyond the Arctic Circle, almost forgotten, but with her heart warm and loyal beneath her winter snows.

Mr. President, is it not possible that our plans have fallen thus into confusion because we have not had faith strong enough in the everlasting righteousness of our cause, in the absolute indestructibility of free institutions, in the immutable and indomitable spirit of our people, in their loyalty and devotion, which would lead them in this hour to count nothing too great a sacrifice which must be done to save the Republic from all harm? I have faith in our country. I have faith in the justice of our cause. I have faith in the love and loyalty of the sons of this Republic, and I now ask permission to have read these sincere and patriotic communications to which I have referred, from people unknown to me before they wrote. The first is from Brooklyn, N. Y., from an old lady 78 years old, but one whose words demonstrate that she has not lost her interest in her country; the second is from New York City, from a man over 50, who objects to the maximum age of 45; the third is from a big business man in Alabama, president of a large wholesale concern; and the fourth is from a prominent young man in Arcadia, Fla.

The fifth is from Juneau, Alaska, from a young lady, who says, though far away from the centers of activity, she is still keenly alive to some of the big things confronting our Nation to-day. I withhold from the RECORD the names of certain of the writers and some more personal portions of the letters, but the originals may be consulted by any Senator who may desire to do so. In the case of the Alaska girl, her name with her truly patriotic and eloquent words, written with so clear a comprehension of the Nation's need, I desire to have incorporated in the RECORD.

With reference to the young lady from Alaska, I merely wish to say this word: On the 2d of April I presumed on the time of the Senate to plead for that national organization and integration which I believed to be absolutely necessary for the winning of this war. In my weak way I attempted to give something of the philosophy which I believe underlies such a great and comprehensive plan. I had given some consideration to what I then said, and it took me over an hour to express what I wished to say; but I know that nothing I could have said or nothing which I could possibly now say can speak with a persuasiveness which can approach that of this little girl in Juneau, Alaska, who now pleads with you for that better national organization which I believe to be indispensable if we are to successfully continue in this war against that new and fearful creation of our modern civilization—"the Nation in arms."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., February 10, 1918.

Senator JOSEPH IRWIN FRANCE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: If I had a thousand votes, I would cast them all for passage of your grand bill of conscription as the only way to solve war's industrial problems.

'Tis so direct and wonderfully simple—the keynote to success for America. Can nothing be done to pass it? Who could fail to see what a sweeping power (which we need) to secure our dear country from a disgraceful breakdown.

True, we have the soldiers, all courageous fighters; but they must be fed.

Must red tape be resorted to, in order somebody may have a say of no account, as it often happens?

When I read your bill in the New York Times Magazine it was so striking. The whole plan was like a moving picture to success. Well, here is one without a vote—from an old lady 78 years old—but have not lost my interest in our dear country.

May your bill pass unanimously.

Respectfully, ——— ———.

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 10, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH I. FRANCE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Have just read your article in the Times on the organization of the labor for the farm and factory to stand behind the "boys" on the other side.

From the very start there was nothing in this line but a disorganized crowd of men willing to work, yet no one to take the lead and do something in a practical common-sense way. The man who had been the most extensively advertised, by getting his name and picture in the paper more times than the other fellow, was considered just the man for the place; otherwise he could not get what is called in the language of the day a "look in." No matter whether Republican or Democrat, no one seemed to be able to look ahead 24 hours. They could not see a chance of a serious condition ever confronting them, and that is more responsible than anything else for the present seemingly chaotic condition of affairs. If you had a pull, you could get where your services could be of some good. With no pull you could go work as a laborer or at anything you could get. There is an endless chance to criticize, but this is the time to build and not destroy, and much criticism tends that latter way, though honest criticism from anyone should prove beneficial. The difficulty is that honest criticism not judiciously made may start a conflagration.

One thing I object to in your article is the 18 to 45 rule. Why? There are plenty of men over 45 more competent than many men under. When the country needs men who can and are willing to work, why toss a man in the scrap heap because he is 45. If the rule is to apply to war workers in the factory, why not apply it to the President of the United States, Members of the House of Representatives, Senate, Cabinet, etc.? I am over 50 years old, yet am just as competent to-day as I was at 35, with the additional advantage of experience.

* * * * * * *

Yours, ——— ———.

———, ALABAMA, February 14, 1918.

Senator JOSEPH IRWIN FRANCE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have read in the New York Times an account of your bill which you have introduced in Congress entitled "Conscription for all men from 18 to 45 years," and I wish to express to you my sincere wish that this bill will be acted upon favorably in Congress, as it is certainly just to the Nation as a whole, and would very likely include myself, and I am only 40 years of age. But be that as it may, until the war is over every man's business is war, and if he can not serve in the trenches or in the Navy very likely he could serve in some other department that will help to prosecute this war to a successful and final closing.

My line of business has already been conscripted in service, and the * * *, as a whole, are doing as much as any other line of business men in sacrificing profits and working on small margins to help win the war, and every man, woman, and child in the South as a rule are trying to do their bit in every way possible.

With my very best wishes for the passage of your bill, I am,

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

———, FLORIDA, February 12, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH IRWIN FRANCE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Noting an excerpt of your conscription bill in my New York Sunday Times.

This is the only letter I have ever written since the outbreak of the war, except a few, very few, personal letters to my delegation, although have handled all the war data. * * * In my judgment the bill is the most important proposal of all endeavors by the Government. It is more in accord with what I have at all times been sure would prevail than any measure introduced in Congress. It is the only sure foundation and underpinning upon which a safe governmental fabric and superstructure can be builded for a successful prosecution of the war and a safe return to civic life. This is merely to express an individual interest, which I, however, believe is shared by every true American patriot.

Give my regards and best wishes to my life-long friend, your compatriot in Congress, Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER.

Sincerely, ——— ———.

JUNEAU, ALASKA, March 7, 1918.

Senator JOSEPH IRWIN FRANCE,
Annapolis, Md.

DEAR SIR: In the February 10 issue of the New York Times I read a short sketch of one of your conscription plans. I was quite pleased with the article and wrote it in a little poem, which I thought you might like to see, so I am sending you a copy. Kindly pardon all the errors of an Alaskan girl who, though far away from the centers of activity, is still keenly alive to some of the big things confronting our Nation to-day.

Yours, very truly, BINGIE OLDS CARPENTER,
Occidental Hotel, Juneau, Alaska.

IN UNITY IS STRENGTH.

While a great number of men in Congress are worrying about having the War Department changed
A small number of men are thinking of the whole Nation being rearranged.
These few are the men of brains who look ahead
And would see that all our Army would be clothed, cared for, and fed.
They would reorganize immediately as a war measure of the day
And later develop the plan into a permanent national policy that would stay.
Whereby the United States might know in detail at all times
Just what its resources were in man power for every vital industry in all lines.
The immediate war project in brief would be
To enroll all men between 18 and 45 and thus they could see
What every man could best be called to do
When needed at home or afar to protect Red, White, and Blue.
The future plans of this great unity stand
Would enroll every man, woman, and child within the land
And to keep records of each, their birth and death, and all between
So as to know the Nation's power in full it would seem.
Some of the Senators who are the leaders of this plan
Think that to win the war we must be organized to a man.
In upholding this drafting plan they say in part
The following words which must come right from the heart:
The best and most effective thing we have to-day
Is our drafting law, that we all will say;
For when we draft men we get the fighting force we need
And don't have the hazards of the voluntary creed.
But as President Wilson and everyone will say
What use is a war horse in a land without the hay?
In other words, if our Army go to the front to fight
Without an organized system how can they be fed right?
The farmers and munition hands should all be drafted, too.
There then would be a head to things and the flag could pilot through.
The way things stack up now it seems we draft our men to fight
And make them go to Europe just to clean the Germans right.
If we do this, why don't we then draft all the factory dads
That make the guns and food and things to keep the Army lads?
The Army and the Navy, who are toiling in the strife,
Can never win without the men behind who sustains life.
For every soldier in the field it takes at home five men
To supply all the food and guns and shells to them.
Not only think of ourselves, but our allies need to eat,
It will take a mighty organization to supply them fat and meat and wheat.
When the working power of the whole United States will be enrolled to a man
Our President then being at the head can
Have all the help in any special line
To do a job in record-breaking time.
Classified power in these modern times is the only kind that counts,
Whether in the little-town affairs or in the vast national amounts.
The sooner we realize that the drafting and unity must not only take in those who go to the front to fight,
But those in every walk of life, then only will things come out right.
And how easy it will be to conquer all the plans of autocracy
And with the strength of united, itemized, and detailed labor power bring to all the world the light of justice and democracy.

(Bingie Olds Carpenter.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, there are a number of very short bills on the calendar, to which I think there is no objection, providing for certain amendments to the national bank act, and which are urgently desired by the Comptroller of the Currency to be considered. I should be very much gratified if we might dispose of those bills at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we ought to proceed with the regular order.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. If there be no further petitions and memorials, reports of committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 2496) for the refund of duties paid on materials destroyed by fire, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 413) thereon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2205) for the relief of Isaac J. Reese (Rept. No. 416); and

A bill (S. 3566) authorizing the President to appoint Second Lieut. Ansel G. Wineman as a provisional second lieutenant in the Regular Army (Rept. No. 415).

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 417) thereon.

NATIONAL GERMAN-AMERICAN ALLIANCE.

Mr. KING. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 3529) to repeal the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National German-American Alliance," approved February 25, 1907, and I submit a report No. 414) thereon.

In this connection I desire to state that later, if I have the time, I shall submit my personal views in regard to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

ALLEY HOUSES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4410) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys of the District of Columbia," approved September 25, 1914, and I submit a report (No. 418) thereon. As this is an urgent matter, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from Utah that in 1914 Congress passed a law prohibiting the use of houses in certain alleys in the District of Columbia. That law requires that the use of those houses be discontinued on July 1, 1918. The houses which still remain in the alleys and are habitable to-day house between 8,000 and 9,000 people. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as well as the Committee on the District of Columbia, think it is important that the time should be extended for the use of those houses until a year after the war, on account of the acute housing conditions in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMOOT. If the bill is not going to lead to any debate I shall not object, but if it leads to debate I shall object to its immediate consideration. Can the Senator say whether or not there is likely to be any debate on the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I wish to say that it is important that the people who are occupying these houses should know whether they can remain in them, because unless this bill is passed they will have to vacate them on July 1, 1918. Your committee thought that it was very important that the matter should be acted upon at once.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the bill leads to any considerable debate I reserve the right to object, but if it does not I shall not object.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to take a moment. I was very much interested in the enactment of the law which this bill proposes to suspend, and it would only be because of the urgent necessities of the Government itself that I would consent to any suspension at all of that law. I agreed to this report in the committee; but I wish to state for the benefit of the record that I did so simply because of the necessities of the Government and because of the necessity of those people who are now occupying alley houses having some place in which to live. I did not do it out of any sympathy whatever for the owners of the property; I have no sympathy for them at all. They have taken no steps whatever since the law was passed to meet its terms. When it was passed they declared that it was unconstitutional and that they were going to fight it to the end; but they have apparently abandoned that plan of action. So I have no sympathy for them at all, and I want them to understand that when the time limit fixed by this suspending bill expires they must be prepared to obey the law as it is now written or suffer the consequences. The conditions that are a disgrace to our Capital must be abolished just as soon as it is possible to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from Washington that I think the entire committee is in sympathy with his views in regard to this matter. There is no disposition to stop the removal of these houses, but simply to delay it in order that the housing accommodations of the city may be improved. There are 90,000 more people here than there were before the war, and it is hard to get houses. My idea in regard to the present consideration of this bill was that the people living in those houses ought to know what they have to depend upon. So far as I am concerned, I am in entire sympathy with the Senator from Washington. I think the houses ought to be done away with, but I think the time limit should be extended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not intend to suggest that the chairman of the committee took any different attitude. I am satisfied that he is in hearty accord with my position in the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Absolutely.

Mr. OWEN. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the operation of the second paragraph of section 1 (relating to the use or occupation of alley buildings as dwellings) of the act of Congress approved September 25, 1914, entitled "An act to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys of the District of Columbia," be, and the same hereby is, postponed until the expiration of one year following the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION OF GARBAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I also report from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (H. R. 10613) to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse of the District of Columbia, and I submit a report (No. 419) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. President, I will say in regard to this bill that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia thought they had a contract for the collection and disposal of the garbage and refuse in the District of Columbia, and there was a forfeit of $3,000 put up; but the contractors refused to sign the contract and forfeited the $3,000. As matters now stand there is no way in which to get rid of the refuse. This is a House bill, which has been passed by the House, and it gives to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a means of providing for the disposition of the refuse and the garbage.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator what expense to the Government is involved in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It gives the commissioners the privilege of condemning certain properties in order that they may carry on the business. They now have no means whatever of disposing of the refuse and the garbage. They had a contract, as they thought; there was a forfeit of $3,000 put up; but when the time came to sign the contract the contractors refused to sign it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has not answered my question, and I shall have to put it in another way. Has the Senator any idea as to how much money will be involved in the passage of this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I suggest that the bill be read, so that the Senator can see. There is quite an amount involved, I think some $600,000; but that will be reduced to about $200,000 by the revenue from the disposal of the by-products.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object until I see whether or not it precipitates a discussion. If it does and there is any delay, I must make an objection.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that the passage of this bill is very important if we want the refuse and the garbage taken care of in the District of Columbia. The commissioners have no means whatever of taking care of it after the expiration of the present contract, which will expire on June 30 of this year.

Mr. SWANSON. I reserve the right to object when I see how much time it will take.

Mr. OWEN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Virginia will not get impatient. This is a matter of supreme importance to the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It is a very important matter to the health of the people of Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. The present contract expires on the 30th of June. No one has been willing to enter into a new contract, and the District of Columbia has to take care of this garbage if the health of the people is to be conserved. I hope, even if it does take a few minutes, that the bill will be considered at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the commissioners have made three advertisements for bids. They got one, but the company submitting it has refused to sign the contract, and forfeited the $3,000 that was put up; and nobody can be gotten to take the contract.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that the bill provides for an appropriation of $620,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say that that is the initial proposition; but a great deal of it comes back from the sale of by-products—the greases, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the bill be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I reserve the right to object. I have not the slightest idea what the bill proposes, and I can not tell unless I either read it myself or hear it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 4460) for the relief of Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4461) granting a pension to Abbie B. Garrett (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 4462) granting a pension to Etta Warner (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 4463) granting an increase of pension to Henry Divelbiss (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4464) for the survey and construction of a system of military highways on the Pacific coast (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce a bill because I am obliged to leave the Chamber. It is a bill authorizing the President to increase the Military Establishment by an additional 3,000,000 men. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I think by next Friday I shall be prepared to submit some remarks to the Senate in support of its passage.

The bill (S. 4459) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding after paragraph 4, section 1, the following: "The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 3,000,000 men, organized, officered, and equipped, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, such men to be called for training at such time and in such numbers as the President may direct."

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That section 2 of the aforesaid act be amended by striking out the sentence "Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens and who at the time of such draft shall be between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with this act."

INCREASE OF NATIONAL ARMY.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I introduce a bill directing the Secretary of War to call an additional 1,500,000 men from the registry of the selective-draft act and to proceed forthwith to train and equip them for service in the National Army.

In introducing it I should like to say that I notice in the press the Secretary of War is considering this matter and that conferences are being held about it, and I presume that Congress is waiting until somebody in the War Department prepares a bill and has it introduced. My opinion is that Congress ought to act immediately and that there ought not to be any delay in increasing the Army. Instead of holding conferences we ought to act. The foundation for this increase is already laid in laws that have already been enacted. All that is necessary is to call an additional number of men, and the brief bill which I am now introducing authorizes contracts and the incurrence of expenses that may be necessary in carrying out this work. There ought not to be a day, there ought not to be an hour, lost. Destiny and opportunity are marching by while we are holding conferences. One year, at least, is required to train men for battle, and immediate steps ought to be taken to provide them. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 4465) to increase the National Army was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, to which I trust there may be no objection, and I shall ask immediate consideration for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 233), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing is hereby directed to inquire into the reasons for the irregular delivery of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to addressees outside of the District of Columbia; and also as to what improvements may be adopted that will make more legible the mailing addresses placed on the wrappers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some weeks ago the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD outside of the District of Columbia was suspended. I called attention to that fact, and an explanation was given that there was not a sufficient supply of print paper to print it. Shortly after the supply of paper appeared to be adequate and the RECORD was again sent to those who are designated by Senators and Members of the other House and they were received to some extent at least. Complaints are now coming to me that the RECORD is being received so irregularly that it is of very little consequence to those who want to read the RECORD and keep up with the proceedings of Congress, and there are many such people in the country, some in my own State.

Two letters came to me yesterday, and I will read just a paragraph from each. One letter says:

Yesterday morning the RECORD of April 10 reached me—

This was written April 25—

It stirred my blood some to think that somebody held up my mail as long as he pleased. The RECORDS come usually two at a time in fair condition, but now everything is mixed. This morning the RECORD for April 5 has arrived, but nearly all the numbers up to and including April 20 are here.

That letter is from a lady residing in Massachusetts, who reads the RECORD, a New Hampshire woman.

The next letter is from a gentleman living on a farm in New Hampshire, an educated man, formerly a resident of the State of Texas, who has returned to his old home. He says:

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD now comes to me addressed in such better way as that the postal clerks can read the addressing, but to offset this improvement the dates come badly mixed so as to break up all consecutive numbering and dates; for example, those for the 5th and 10th of April were followed by those for the 18th and 19th. This method makes it as interesting as reading the dictionary, as I am not smart enough to keep up with the procession. If other recipients get theirs in the same way, it may well disgust those who try to read the RECORD. I suppose the Official Bulletin gets out promptly. It looks to me as though some sinister method lies against outside distribution of the RECORD.

Mr. President, there is a great need of improvement in the Postal Service at the present time. It not only applies to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD but it equally applies to our individual mail. As an illustration, three copies of my home paper—those for Thursday, Friday, and Saturday last—reached me this morning all at the same time. A paper printed in Manchester, N. H., on last Thursday also came in this morning's mail. Our letters are to a very large extent being transmitted in the same irregular fashion.

I have no disposition to invite a controversy about this matter, but I understand that it largely results from the fact that the Postmaster General in his wisdom or unwisdom—unwisdom I think—has taken off the cars where the mail was formerly distributed, and that the mail is now distributed at the terminals. I noticed one day when I was in the Union Station a great pile of mail at one end of the concourse. A wagonload was there waiting to be distributed, and I have been told that it sometimes remains at certain terminal points four or five days before the mail is distributed.

It is something that ought to be corrected; but that does not enter into this matter that I have called attention to in my resolution. I simply want the Committee on Printing to call before it those who are handling the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and inquire why it is that the RECORDS are not being sent out with some degree of regularity. I hope the resolution will pass and the grievance complained of be removed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is the resolution to be acted on now?

Mr. FLETCHER. Let the resolution be read again. I did not hear it. I may say that as of the RECORD there were only printed for a while enough copies to supply the local demand, and it was held up as to outside distribution. That might account for the delay.

Mr. GALLINGER. I called attention to it, I will say to the Senator from Florida, and it was then corrected, and the RECORDS were then going out regularly, as I understand it, and they are reaching the people; but in some cases they are reaching them in 5, 10, or 15 days after the date of publication.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not know but that the copies now supplied for outside distribution were printed at a very much later date.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Committee on Printing can readily make an inquiry.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have the resolution read.

The resolution was again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this connection I ask to have printed without reading a portion of an article from the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin of New York, under date of April 25, 1918. It relates to the Postal System in a broader sense, a matter that I feel very sure Congress will have to take cognizance of and look into in the near future.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"INEFFICIENT POSTAL SERVICE.

"Is there any good reason why Congress should not take up the problem of postal reform before it adjourns? The service has steadily deteriorated for many years until at last it has become a monumental example of inefficiency, for which the war is no excuse. No more striking instance of Government failure in business has ever been presented, and for some unaccountable reason there is a singular indifference to public complaints.

"In first-class mails delays are excessive and constant. They began long before the disorganization attributed to the war and before introduction of the parcel post, though the latter much intensified the decline of the service. It is no uncommon experience for letters to be not merely hours but days behind a reasonable period for delivery. Local letters not infrequently require 24 hours for delivery in this city or near-by suburbs, and corresponding delays are a common occurrence in the mail transit between near-by cities. Such delays in first-class mail are a serious concern not alone in family and social affairs but especially in business matters which are particularly dependent upon prompt and regular mails. As this branch of the service is of supreme importance and particularly profitable under the advanced rates, the present low standard of efficiency should not be any longer tolerated. There should be no difficulty in improving this branch of the service, especially as letter rates have been raised from 1 and 2 cents to 2 and 3 cents.

"In the case of second-class mails the deterioration has been much greater than in the first class. Newspapers and periodicals are commonly days and not infrequently a week behind normal delivery. Publishers and subscribers are weary of complaints, which usually receive scant attention and fail to bring any relief. Many complaints are never made, because useless.

"The Post Office is the biggest business institution in the United States. There is no organization more closely interwoven in the life and industry of the country. As a means of communication it is far more vital to convenience and comfort than the telephone or the telegraph; and is only exceeded in importance by the railroads. Yet it is operated on a low and discreditable standard of efficiency. Both as a business organization and as a public service it must be classed as defective, and any of our big business institutions selected at random would smother it in shame by comparison. For this deplorable condition there is only one party to blame, and that is an overpatient public. As long as the public submits to bad service there will be no improvement. When public opinion demands better service with sufficient vigor, improvement will promptly come. At present there seems to be no way of awakening the responsible autocrats and bureaucrats at Washington to a sense of their incapacity. Congress, with its passion for investigation, might with advantage turn on the limelight in this direction. Instead of spending time on Utopian plans for absorption of the telephone, telegraph, and express companies, or the development of motor-truck lines, aeroplane routes, or cutting out pneumatic tubes, etc., it would be far better to meet the primary objects of the service, which are to carry the first and second class mails with promptness and regularity. What have the various commercial organizations to say about our present postal service? The Merchants' Association of this city has already made its protest. Others should follow."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire whether the article he has submitted has anything to do with the mail between this country and our boys at the front?

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not. I think it is the domestic mail that this article discusses. I understand there is a great deal of complaint being made at the nondelivery of mail to the soldiers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hoped that the article had something to do with that subject, and that an inquiry might be made to see how those mails could be facilitated.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I submit a Senate resolution, which I ask to have read and go over under the rule to be called up.

The resolution (S. Res. 234) was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate hereby urges immediate action to provide means for the organization of an army of 5,000,000 men.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to prepare a bill providing for the immediate training of officers and the manufacture of munitions for an army of 5,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule. The morning business is closed.

FIRST YEAR OF PRESENT WAR.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that after the close of the routine morning business on Friday I shall ask permission to submit some brief remarks in a review of the first year of American activity in the present war, its lessons, and suggestions for our future work.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice to Senators that to-morrow morning I expect to call up the conference report on what is known as the espionage bill.

AMENDMENT OF NATURALIZATION LAWS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 220).

Mr. HARDWICK. I present a conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 3132) to amend section 2171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to naturalization.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a request to consider the report now?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; the papers are in the possession of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will lie on the table and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3132) to amend section 2171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to naturalization having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Page 1, subdivision 7: Strike out in lines 5, 6, 7, and 8 the following: "and who may be honorably discharged therefrom after an enlistment of not less than four years, or who may receive an ordinary discharge with recommendation for reenlistment," and insert the following: "and who, after service of not less than three years, may be honorably discharged therefrom, or who may receive an ordinary discharge with recommendation for reenlistment."

Page 2, line 22: Strike out the word "at" and insert in lieu thereof the words "engaged in the present," so as to read: "Any alien serving in the military or naval service of the United States during the time this country is engaged in the present war."

Page 3, line 11: After the words "United States" insert the following: "and the place of such military service shall be construed as the place of residence required to be established."

Page 4, lines 4 and 5: Strike out the words "for the time required."

Page 4, line 21: After the first "the" in the line insert the words "time of the."

Page 6: At the paragraph commencing "During time when the United States is at war," after the word "During," insert the word "the."

Page 7, subdivision 9: In the fifth line of the subdivision, after the word "naturalization," insert "as provided in this subdivision."

Page 8, subdivision 10: In line 3 of the subdivision strike out "May" and insert "July." In line 4 of the subdivision strike out "10" and insert "14."

Page 9, subdivision 11: In line 14 of the subdivision, after the word "hearing," insert "or heard"; strike out the word "due" and insert "90 days"; after the word "notice" insert the words "given by the clerk of the court."

On page 10, in the second proviso: After the words "Provided further" strike out "That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, from time to time, by proclamation or otherwise, to except natives, citizens, subjects, or denizens of any country with which the United States is or may be at war, or any individual or class thereof, from the classification of alien enemies, and thereupon they shall have the privilege to apply for naturalization." In lieu of this insert "That the President of the United States may, in his discretion, upon investigation and report by the Department of Justice fully establishing the loyalty of any alien enemy not included in the foregoing exemption, except such alien enemy from the classification of alien enemy, and thereupon he shall have the privilege of applying for naturalization."

Page 10, subdivision 12: Strike out the word "no" in the first line of the subdivision and insert the word "any."

Page 11, in line 2: Insert, after the words "United States is now at war," the word "who."

Page 11, line 5: After the word "service," insert the following: "may resume his citizenship by taking the oath of allegiance to the United States prescribed by the naturalization law and regulations, and such oath may be taken before any court of the United States or of any State authorized by law to naturalize aliens or before any consul of the United States, and certified copies thereof shall be sent by such court or consul to the Department of State and the Bureau of Naturalization."

Page 16, section 3, paragraph 3: Strike out "Hereafter, subject to the provisions of subdivision 11 of this act, no citizen or subject of any country which by law permits its citizens or subjects to detain their citizenship or allegiance in such country after being naturalized in another country shall be eligible for naturalization in the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title, and agree to the same.

WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10265, commonly known as the housing bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], which will be read:

The SECRETARY. On page 4, at the end of section 1, add the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That in communities where housing development is to be carried on under this act such communities, or persons desiring so to do, shall be permitted to furnish a certain per cent of the cost of providing said housing facilities under such a plan of development and under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of Labor and the persons interested in the plan of development, but in no instance shall a loan of more than 85 per cent of the cost of development be made to such communities or the persons interested in the development: And provided further, That the Government shall take a first lien for the amount of money so advanced by the Government.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. That amendment comes in after line 17 on page 4. Is it the status of the bill now that the Senate has considered all of page 4 except this amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. I think a mistake was made in the announcement by the Secretary. We have only considered page 2.

The amendment ought to come at the end of subsection (b). We have not considered page 3.

Mr. FALL. That was my understanding.

Mr. SWANSON. I think it was a mistake, and I will ask to have it corrected. I believe the amendment was intended to be added to subsection (b) of section 1.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if it would not be possible—I think it would very greatly facilitate matters if it were possible—to consider now an amendment on page 1 of the bill. There will be such amendments offered later, and if the amendment were adopted it would possibly obviate the necessity existing in the minds of Senators to offer various other amendments and bring up the discussion of the general subject. I will say frankly that I offered the suggestion a few days since with reference to this bill which I shall offer at the proper time in the shape of an amendment, but if it is held that the first section on page 1 of the bill can not be amended until after we conclude the consideration of all the other amendments, other amendments will be offered which would not be offered provided that that amendment is adopted by the Senate on page 1.

The suggestion which I offer is that to be consistent with ourselves, not to stultify ourselves, we should strike out the words "Secretary of Labor" in the bill and insert in lieu thereof "President of the United States," vesting directly in the President the power to exercise the authority conferred by the bill. Certainly by the passage yesterday by this body of the Overman bill it becomes all the more apparent that it would be stultification to vest authority in the Secretary of Labor which yesterday we provided should be coordinated or exercised by the President of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will be very glad to withdraw the amendment for the present if the Senator wishes.

Mr. FALL. I wanted to know whether the Senator from Virginia, who has charge of the bill, would insist upon going along in regular order or whether he would be willing to consider now the amendment to section 1?

Mr. SWANSON. I think that would precipitate a long debate on minor matters. I know the amendment the Senator contemplates offering. I suggest that the question as to who shall administer this law be passed over and the bill be perfected, saving the right to offer the amendment later.

Mr. FALL. I will explain my position to the Senator very briefly, if he will allow me.

Mr. SWANSON. Then, we would see if a conclusion could be reached as to that proposition. I suggest that we continue to perfect the bill, and the rights of the Senator will be reserved. I will give him every opportunity, and if the Senator fails to have the administration fixed as he desires in the bill he will have an opportunity to offer his amendment after that is disposed of. It seems to me we would make headway to go on and perfect the bill and then dispose of section 1. There was a unanimous-consent agreement that the bill should be disposed of by sections. We were proceeding by sections, and I will ask to reconsider that section in committee of the whole.

Mr. LODGE. We are not proceeding by sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor. Does he yield further?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Unanimous consent was given that the bill should be disposed of by sections.

Mr. LODGE. To dispose of the committee amendments first.

Mr. SWANSON. No; that was rejected, and then a unanimous-consent agreement was made that the bill should be considered by paragraphs.

Mr. LODGE. We have never disposed of paragraph (b) on page 3.

Mr. SWANSON. We have not reached that.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is away over on page 4.

Mr. SWANSON. That was a mistake. The Senator from Massachusetts was not here. That ought to be an amendment to paragraph (b). Unanimous consent was given that the bill should be disposed of by paragraphs.

Mr. LODGE. I supposed we were on paragraph (b).

Mr. SWANSON. We are on paragraph (b).

Mr. LODGE. That does not shut out anybody from offering amendments to any part of the bill.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will yield a moment, I will explain exactly my position.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to know about the unanimous-consent agreement referred to.

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not understand that there had been any unanimous-consent agreement. My recollection is that I objected to the request that was made in the beginning of the consideration of the bill, and I said at that time I could see some reasons for the plan to be adopted with reference to appropriation bills, but I was opposed to it with reference to bills of this kind.

Mr. SWANSON. I asked unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered first.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; and I objected.

Mr. SWANSON. An objection was interposed, and then I asked unanimous consent, as I recollect, that the bill should be disposed of by paragraphs for amendments. I have no desire to insist on that request, but if a motion to reconsider should prevail I simply desire to dispose of it in the way that may be most speedily done and most satisfactorily to the Senate. My suggestion was that we should proceed with the bill and perfect it. Of course, the Senator from New Mexico has intimated to me that if the authority to administer it is not given, as he suggests, he would offer a certain amendment, and after that question is disposed of that amendment could be offered, but what I asked was to complete the bill instead of reverting back to section 1, paragraph 1. I leave it entirely to the pleasure of the Senate. That was simply a suggestion of mine.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that my amendment has been withdrawn for the present, so that the Senate can go on with other amendments to the bill.

Mr. FALL. I am perfectly willing always to state exactly my reasons for any suggestion that I may make. If we are to proceed as we are proceeding now, with the understanding that we can not offer an amendment now and have it considered and adopted or rejected to section 1, if that is the parliamentary situation, then I shall have an amendment to offer to subsection (c) on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the parliamentary situation, the Senator from New Mexico may offer his amendment now. Whether it shall be considered or not is a matter that is to be determined.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I will explain my position exactly. I propose to offer an amendment to this bill provided this authority is left as it is now in the bill, on page 3, after the word "money," in line 8, to insert:

Provided further, That in managing, leasing, renting, exchanging, selling, or conveying such lands, houses, buildings, and equipment no preference shall be given one laborer or class of laborers over another.

I shall follow that up by proposing amendments to other portions of the bill along a similar line if the power to exercise the authority conferred by the terms of this bill is vested in the President of the United States. I do not care to raise these questions or to offer these amendments providing that there shall be no differentiation in favor of or against union labor; otherwise I shall offer the amendments and discuss them at the proper time, giving my reasons for guarding the provisions of the bill by such amendments, as I understand those reasons to exist. If the power is vested in the President it is for him to exercise it, and I shall then have no desire to offer these later amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment which the Senator intends to propose be sent to the desk.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: On line 3, page 1, I move to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor, under the direction of the President of the United States," and to insert "President of the United States."

Mr. SWANSON. We have not yet finished the reading of the bill to that point. The Senator's amendment will be in order when the reading shall have reached that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is now in order, as the Chair understands.

Mr. FALL. The amendment is on page 1, line 3.

Mr. SWANSON. That has been passed.

Mr. FALL. That is exactly the proposition about which I was asking, and the Chair has ruled that I might offer this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the parliamentary situation to be such that the amendment may be offered at this time.

Mr. FALL. Then I offer that amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to make a suggestion. There must be some final disposition of things. The language "the Secretary of Labor, under the direction of the President of the United States," has already been adopted by the Senate by a vote. That question was voted on and decided in the affirmative by the Senate. I have told the Senator from New Mexico that I would move to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted, so that these questions could come up again, but that paragraph has been amended and disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. The paragraph was not fully disposed of for I myself have an amendment to offer to it, but the Senator from Virginia is right in saying that the amendment was agreed to. The vote whereby it was agreed to ought to be reconsidered, if the Senator from New Mexico is to offer his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that this amendment proposes to strike out some other portion of the bill that was not agreed to.

Mr. FALL. It would be necessary to perfect the bill, of course, to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor." where they occur, for instance, on page 4. There the words "the Secretary of Labor" appear twice; that is, in subsection (c) and also in section 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Why does the Senator from Virginia think the amendment is not now in order, if he wishes to raise the question?

Mr. SWANSON. Because unanimous consent was given that the bill should be considered and disposed of by paragraphs as in Committee of the Whole. Subsection (a) has been read and amended, and subsection (b) is now under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has there been any unanimous-consent agreement about that?

Mr. SWANSON. There was a unanimous-consent agreement that the bill should be considered by paragraphs. I think that will be found in the RECORD.

Mr. FALL. That it should be considered by sections, I presume, not by paragraphs.

Mr. SWANSON. There is bound to be some disposition of a matter. The Senate can not adopt a section and then proceed to dispose of it again without reconsidering the vote by which it was first adopted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think there could have been such an agreement on a bill of this character. I never heard of such a thing in the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. I will look up the RECORD in regard to the matter.

Mr. LODGE. It would not be allowed to shut up the text of a bill. I am not speaking of committee amendments—but to shut up the text of a bill in water-tight compartments, and after they have been read that then the text of the bill could not be amended. The whole bill is open to amendment until it is passed to a third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is usually the case.

Mr. SWANSON. The whole bill is amendable after it gets into the Senate, but does the Chair hold that, after an amendment is adopted as in Committee of the Whole, then it can be further amended without a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, and there be no termination to a matter?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Virginia had listened to what I said, he would have known that I did not refer to the amendments of the committee, but that I referred to the text of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I asked unanimous consent; but objection was made, and the whole bill was read.

Mr. LODGE. Then the whole bill is open to amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. When that was completed, if the Senator will permit me, I asked unanimous consent that the committee amendments should be first considered. Unanimous consent was refused. I then asked unanimous consent that the bill should be considered by paragraphs, each paragraph to be open to amendment from the committee or from any Senator. That agreement, as I understand, was made, and we were proceeding with the consideration of the bill by paragraph and had reached paragraph (b).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that there has been any unanimous-consent agreement to adopt this bill by sections and that when a section shall have been completed it can not be further amended. The Chair does not understand that there is any unanimous-consent agreement that there shall be such a procedure.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Secretary to look up the record of the first day's proceedings, when the bill came up for consideration, and see what the agreement was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is in order.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. For the purpose of allowing the Senator from New Mexico to offer his amendment, which does take the place of an amendment which was agreed to—that is, the insertion of the words "under the direction of the President of the United States"—I ask the Senator from Virginia to ask unanimous consent that the vote by which that amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. SWANSON. I stated to the Senator from New Mexico that after we proceeded further with these paragraphs—and I do not see why any Senator should object—I would ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which that was agreed to, so that it could be further discussed.

Mr. FALL. I think I have the floor, Mr. President. I have endeavored to explain, and will again explain, for the benefit of the Senator from Virginia, that if we now proceed—although I, of course, understand that we shall have a later opportunity, with or without his consent, to amend this section, though I thank him for his consideration, yet I know that I would have a right to offer the amendment which I proposed—if we are going to proceed now, I shall offer other amendments, and I will say to the Senator from Virginia that, in my judgment, the amendments which will be offered will require so much more time for their consideration by the Senate that he will lose time instead of gaining time, unless he accepts the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, if it is necessary to reconsider the words or the paragraph to which I have called attention.

Mr. SWANSON. If it will facilitate matters and save time I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which everything has been adopted may be reconsidered, and that we proceed by unanimous consent with a rereading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will relieve the situation. Is there objection? The Chair hearing no objection, it will be so arranged.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as a matter of record, there was no agreement of any kind in reference to this matter. I have before me the RECORD of the first day's proceedings, which discloses that there was no agreement of any kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. SWANSON. From what page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD does the Senator from Massachusetts quote?

Mr. LODGE. From page 5193 of the RECORD of April 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section of the bill is open to amendment, and the Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, when this bill was up for consideration I made the suggestion prior to the passage of the Overman bill that, to be consistent, the words "Secretary of Labor" should be stricken from this bill and the words "President of the United States" should be inserted. As I have just stated, I can not conceive now, since the passage of the Overman bill, how there could be any possible objection to the amendment which I have offered. I sincerely hope it will be adopted. It will relieve my mind, I will say, to a very great extent of the objections which I have, and which I shall urge most strenuously, to other provisions of the bill.

I am frank to say that I think the bill is a very poorly considered bill. I am distinctly in favor of voting all the money necessary for housing purposes in cooperation with necessary war work, but there has not yet been in this or in any other Congress a measure of such importance as affecting the entire future of this country, in my judgment, as this measure now up for consideration may become.

It is adopting an entirely new rule, Mr. President; and in the event the amendment which I have offered is rejected, I shall undertake to explain at length my reasons for offering it and the objections which I have to other provisions of the bill vesting this absolute authority in the Secretary of Labor.

I am aware of the fact that some of my colleagues are willing to amend this bill by providing that the authority shall be vested in the Secretary of Labor, in the Secretary of the Navy, and in the Secretary of War, but that would not remove my objections at all. The authority, if it is to be vested in anyone, should be vested in the President of the United States. If the President of the United States then chooses to delegate that authority to the Secretary of the Navy, to the Secretary of War, and to the Secretary of Labor, or to any one of the three or to anyone else whomsoever, his then is the responsibility. After the Senate voted as it did yesterday, certainly I will under no circumstances by my vote assist in the passage of an act—a subsequent piece of legislation—undertaking to drive a wedge into the legislation which we adopted on yesterday.

I have other and very strong reasons for my objection to the bill as it stands now, just as serious even in the event that the amendment which I understand will be offered, possibly in the nature of a substitute for my amendment, shall be adopted.

Mr. President, I do hope that the amendment vesting this power in the President of the United States will be adopted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like, for the information of the Chair and of the Senate, in regard to the understanding as to the procedure during the consideration of this bill, to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5204, as follows:

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be proceeded with by paragraphs, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed with the bill by paragraphs. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. And that the committee amendments be first considered.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; that the committee amendments be first considered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not willing to consent that committee amendments shall be first considered. I can see reason for such a request in the case of an appropriation bill, but I think there are many reasons why we should not follow that practice in the case of a bill of this character.

Mr. SWANSON. Very well; I will modify the request and merely ask that the consideration of the bill be proceeded with by paragraphs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have reached another agreement, and I suggest that we proceed under that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Have I the floor, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and I are agreed on one point, and that is that the powers conferred by this bill should not be conferred upon the Secretary of Labor. However, we differ in regard to conferring those powers on the President. I believe that the various departments having contracts and in Government plants control of the industries, for the employees of which it is proposed to provide housing facilities, should administer this bill, namely, the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, and therefore I offer as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico an amendment conferring these powers upon the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy; or, if my amendment is not the first amendment offered, I offer my amendment as a substitute to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico and should like to speak to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the bill is to be considered by sections. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, however, is not in order just now, because the words proposed to be stricken out are not yet in the bill; those words constitute an amendment reported by the committee, but have not yet been adopted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Chair to state why my amendment is out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Because the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey proposes to strike out words which have not yet been incorporated in the bill. The Secretary will read the words proposed to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the words "Secretary of Labor," the committee proposes to insert the words "under the direction of the President of the United States"; Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN proposes to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor, under the direction of the President of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words "under the direction of the President of the United States" are not yet incorporated in the bill. Those words merely constitute a suggested amendment.

Mr. LODGE. If the Chair will permit me, the Senator from New Jersey can surely move to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. And to insert the "Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, there is an amendment pending now to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor" and insert the words "President of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Jersey can move his amendment as a substitute for that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. We have reconsidered the whole matter, and we are now commencing anew with the bill as though nothing had been done heretofore. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor and has offered the first amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor" and insert——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I understood that I had an amendment pending and that the Senator from New Jersey was offering his amendment as a substitute for my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the Chair's understanding at first; but we have reconsidered the whole matter and we have commenced on the bill anew. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized, and his amendment is pending.

Mr. FALL. I bow to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand the Senator——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SWANSON. Has the Senator from New Jersey the floor?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have the floor; yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand; the Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have offered this amendment to the bill because I do not believe that the powers conferred in this bill are conferred on the proper department. It creates a new building organization in the Department of Labor that is entirely unnecessary and impracticable. I am a member of the committee, and I was opposed to vesting these powers in the Department of Labor, and several other members of the committee agreed with me; but realizing and recognizing the emergency that existed in the lack of housing facilities for employees at various war plants, we agreed to report the bill, leaving the title as it was when introduced, but reserving the right to amend the bill on the floor and to oppose the bill if these powers were not transferred to the department which we believed was the proper department.

There is no good reason to create a new building department; it is contrary to the policy at the present time of the Senate, that the departments shall be coordinated and consolidated instead of increased in number; it is contrary to the idea of efficiency, which is so sorely needed, and the lack of which has been so often criticized on this floor.

Under my amendment the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy will be empowered to undertake the housing of the employees in the plants under their direct control. This bill provides $50,000,000 to erect houses for the employees at the arsenals, at the navy yards, and in the war industries controlled by private corporations; but wherever the houses are to built they will come directly under the contractual relations of either the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy.

There is absolutely no reason to create a new building department at tremendous cost to the taxpayers, a new organization, causing confusion and conflict with the other departments; and why? Is the War Department equipped to build the houses at the plants where it is buying war munitions, or at its own arsenals? There is a construction division in the Council of National Defense with a thousand officers, expert engineers and construction experts, inspectors, draftsmen, and so forth. They have purchased machinery to construct the buildings for those departments. They have built 16 cantonments at a cost of $138,000,000. They have contracted for and built $338,000,000 worth of buildings for the War Department; and all of the physical construction of the buildings for the War Department has been placed under that division. They have prepared a contract which, after a year's experience, has been found to be economical and satisfactory to the contractors.

Is the Navy Department equipped to take over these activities? The Navy Department has the Bureau of Yards and Docks, with 400 engineers and construction experts. They have built an office building in this city containing 940,000 square feet. They have built the addition to the Academy at Annapolis. They have built $120,000,000 worth of buildings. They can take care of these activities. They are in their stride, so to speak; and there is absolutely no excuse for creating another building department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am inclined to agree with the statements made by the Senator, and with the amendment which he has offered; but I wanted to ask the Senator whether, from his investigations or the investigations of his committee, he is satisfied that the War Department in the erection of the cantonments has adopted plans that argue that it can construct these buildings cheaper than they could be constructed by some other agency? There has been considerable criticism that the War Department, through the cost-plus contracts, has incurred expenses and expenditures far beyond the benefits which have been derived; that the buildings have cost too much; that they have had too many instrumentalities and agencies, as a result of which the Government has not received a quid pro quo.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very glad the Senator from Utah has raised that question. I quite realize that at the beginning of this war, when haste was the essential factor, when it was absolutely essential that we should house a draft army of nearly 700,000 men before the winter set in, these cantonments should be hastily constructed, and therefore they had to gather the labor from all points of the compass, they had to make their contracts in a hasty manner, and it is quite true that there was great extravagance and a lavish expenditure of money; but since that time, I am told, this construction division has been reorganized. They have improved their system of contracts. They have a fee system. They pay a fee to the architect and to the builder, and in the case of recent construction I understand that the cost has been very moderate; but this bill provides that the contracts shall be advertised for upon public bids. Therefore in the present situation the criticism of the Senator from Utah does not apply.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wanted to ask, if the Senator's amendment is adopted, will the building operations be conducted through the cantonment department presided over by Mr. W. K. Starrett?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand so, yes; and in the Navy Department under Admiral Parks.

Mr. President, there is another objection that I have to leaving the administration of this bill in the Department of Labor, and that is that it will create a serious situation in the War Department, and the Navy Department, and the Shipping Board. The materials—lumber, brick, cement, and other building materials—produced in this country required for building are practically being exhausted by the needs of these departments, and it has been necessary to allocate these materials under priority arrangements. After much confusion and difficulty they have accomplished it, and these different departments now have an opportunity to procure the necessary amount of material for their building operations. Now you create another department and you are going to bring about a clash and a conflict which will cause more delay and greater blunders; and haste is the essential factor. The Bethlehem Steel Co., which is making our heavy and light artillery ammunition, can increase the capacity of that plant if it has four or five thousand more employees and it needs to house them; and I understand some of this money—several millions of it—is to be used to build houses at that plant.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Perhaps the question that I am about to propound is not germane to the discussion which the Senator is making. I have heard a good many criticisms, though, that there is no necessity for the erection of buildings by the Government; that the localities in which these industries are being carried on could, with some slight effort and by appeals to their patriotism, care for those who may be employed by the Government in Government activities. What I am afraid of is that if the Government starts upon a housing scheme every man who is doing some work for the Government, no matter where it is, no matter how remote, will appeal to the Government to house his employees, upon the ground that the houses that are furnished in towns or in the neighborhood are not sufficiently hygienic, that the sanitary arrangements are not adequate, that the Government ought to adopt better methods, and that those methods would be best carried on by the Government taking charge of the housing of all of the employees.

Does not the Senator think, from the evidence that was taken before his committee, that the corporations and individuals who have contracts with the Government in the various communities in which these industries are being carried on can, with some little persuation and appeals to their patriotism, care for all of the employees that may be brought there?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am in favor of better housing facilities, better hygienic and sanitary conditions, for the workingman, but we are engaged in a great war, and it is no time to indulge in sociological experiments. What we need is munitions and more munitions, and we need them quickly. While I believe in the English plan of making these houses permanent, so that they can be sold, I believe that they should be built hastily and economically, and only those necessary for the needs of the workingmen at these various plants.

Why, there are hundreds of men in this city to-day, from every locality in the country, anxious to get this money from the Government to build up their different localities, wherever there is a war munition plant, and for many of these projects there is absolutely no necessity. I understand that this $50,000,000 is not to be limited to that, but that the motive of those who are back of it is to create great community centers, involving the expenditure of $500,000,000, $600,000,000, or possibly $700,000,000 of the Government's money.

Now, this is a war emergency measure. We have no right at this time to stop to consider uplift questions. What we need is housing at these various plants as quickly and economically as we can get it, so that we can get the necessary amount of labor. We do not want to waste time with a lot of fancy architectural designs, the consideration of idealistic plans, when we need to house these men at once.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do.

Mr. KING. I do not think the Senator quite apprehended my view. I perfectly agree with him that this is not the time for any experiments in sociology or in the betterment of the conditions of the people. We are at war, and it is important that we should get munitions just as rapidly as possible; but the question that I asked the Senator was whether the investigations before the committee demonstrated that it was absolutely necessary, in order to obtain the munitions that the Government requires, that the Government should go into this experiment of building houses?

Apropos of what I have just said, if the Senator will pardon me, I have learned that some of these idealists are in these departments now, and that they have drawn elaborate plans for houses that would be suitable for men whose income was forty or fifty thousand dollars a year, with oak floors, and with magnificent furnishings—permanent houses. What I am afraid of is that if we do go into this housing business the matter will drift into the hands of some of these idealists and faddists, and we will have millions and hundreds of millions of dollars ultimately to pay for this experiment placed in the hands of irresponsible people.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think that if my amendment prevails, and the responsibility of building these houses—directly designed to increase the production of these various munition plants—is placed in the War and Navy Departments, those officers will see the practical side of this and build these houses as economically as possible, and only at those plants where they are necessary. Now, I have heard that that idealistic plan referred to by the able Senator from Utah exists in the Department of Labor, under Mr. Eidlitz; and that is what this bill is designed to bring about. It does not exist in the War and the Navy Departments. They are carrying on this war, and they see the practical side of it; and the only reason I have offered this amendment is because it is the only practical and businesslike way to build these houses; not that I have anything against the Department of Labor or their desire to control this situation. The only practical, businesslike way to do this thing is to put it in the departments that have control of these various war activities.

Why, think of this possible situation, Mr. President: Take an arsenal under the direction of the Secretary of War. These houses are erected, and they are rented under the direction of the Secretary of Labor. The plumbing needs repairing, or the houses need to be painted; is the manager of that arsenal to take charge of that? No. The Department of Labor have to be conferred with and their consent obtained first, because this bill provides that the Secretary of Labor shall manage these houses. Take the Bethlehem Steel Co. plant, in charge of a superintendent responsible for furnishing our munitions. A man applies to him—an expert machinist, we will say—for employment. He says, "I can not come unless I can be housed"; but the superintendent of the Bethlehem Steel Co. has to confer with the Department of Labor before he can procure a house for his own employee.

Mr. President, if the Senate believes in efficiency, if it believes in coordination, if it believes in conserving the funds of this Government in the interest of the taxpayer and the bond buyer, it will vote for this amendment.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the trouble about the Senator's amendment is that it does not cover the subject matter of the bill itself. If, in connection with it, he would move to strike out all after the words "United States," in line 7, down to the word "and," in line 8—that is, the words "and in industries connected with and essential to the national defense"—his argument as to placing the power in the hands of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and not in the hands of the Secretary of Labor nor in the President generally to allocate as he pleases, might have much more effect.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The jurisdiction under this act over plants where war industries are being carried on is over plants with which the Government now has contracts.

Mr. FALL. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, he is devoting his argument and his amendment entirely to one portion of the bill. The Navy purposes and the arsenals are specifically mentioned in the bill, and his amendment and his argument go to that particular phase of the bill; but there is a much broader proposition involved in this bill. The Senator must recall that Congress has been passing almost every day war legislation, and we have now declared every industry in the United States a necessary war industry. Agriculture itself, of course, is. Mining is. We have so defined it in specific language. Now, the only possible way to allocate the duties under this bill is by some central authority. I assume, of course, that the President of the United States would use the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War where it was necessary to vest the power in them under this bill. I presume that he would do that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand the Senator to state that these war industries are not under the control and direction of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. FALL. No; the Senator misunderstands me. For instance, take the words in the bill, "for such industrial workers as are engaged in arsenals and navy yards of the United States." Now, the workers in the arsenals, of course, are directly under or connected with the performance of the duties of the Secretary of War or some of his departments. In the navy yards of the United States, of course, they are directly connected with the Secretary of the Navy or some of his departments; but the industries connected with and essential to the national defense have been defined by the Congress of the United States to be every possible industry in the United States, including agriculture.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico further yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand, the only plants where these houses are to be constructed are those plants having large contracts with the War and Navy Departments, and where the houses are essential to increase the number of employees, so as to furnish the Government with its necessary equipment; and naturally, while the bill may be as broad and is as broad as the Senator says, the need, the good to be accomplished, is directly connected with those plants that are now controlled under contracts with the Government.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, does the Senator think it is a violent assumption for me to say that that being the case the President of the United States would leave the authority where it could be best executed?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I believe, Mr. President, that these two departments, having direct knowledge of their own needs and having construction divisions in those departments, are better equipped to administer this act than the President of the United States.

Mr. FALL. I agree thoroughly with the Senator that they have made some progress possibly in their particular line of industry or social uplift even, and that they might perform better service than some one else whom the President might discover or in whom he might vest this authority. However, this is a broad bill. Under the terms of it they can go into the State of Arizona to-day, and without availing themselves of the authority vested heretofore by the Congress of the United States in the President, the President of the United States can take over the mines in Arizona. They can go into the State of Colorado, and availing themselves of the authority vested in the President of the United States they may take over every coal mine in that State. They can go into the State of West Virginia, into the State of Ohio, or Illinois, or Pennsylvania, and without taking over the mines themselves, as the President is authorized to do under the terms of what we know generally as the food act, under the terms of this bill the Secretary of Labor can take every house of every laborer engaged in these industries who is now at work, and if he chooses to do so he can say, "You are not a union-labor man, and therefore you will have to vacate the house, and I take charge of it and I rent it," and a union-labor card shall be necessary to be presented before the occupant can obtain work in the mine, because unless he can find a house to live in he can not work.

This may be a very violent assumption, and doubtless it is, but I want to say, in passing, I am inclined to believe at times, and I am not convinced at all it would not be for the best interests of this country, right now and in the future, if every laborer in the country belonged to a union-labor organization. I am inclined to think that possibly that is coming about, and I am not prepared to say that it would not be by odds the best for the country now and in the future if every laborer in the country was a member of a union-labor organization.

To-day, however, we are confronted with this condition, that less than 10 per cent of the laborers of the United States are members of labor unions, while in England they can deal collectively with labor unions because the labor unions constitute 90 per cent of the labor of the country. We are not in that condition now.

The Secretary of Labor declared one great duty of his office to be the building up of the union-labor organizations, as I understand it. He has not only declared that the one great duty of his office as Secretary of Labor was mediation and conciliation between employers and employees, but that mediation and conciliation meant dealing with men collectively, and to deal with them collectively meant that they must be unionized.

Mr. THOMAS. If that is the case, does not the Senator think that Mr. Wilson is secretary of union labor rather than Secretary of Labor?

Mr. FALL. I am afraid so. Of course, I can not speak for him except out of his own mouth. I have here his speech made at Seattle in 1913, on reading which I think the Senator would be justified in forming that conclusion, and from various other utterances of the Secretary. He may be right, as I said; it may be best in time of peace, it may be best in time of war, that labor in this country should be unionized. The only difficulty that I can see and the only objection I have to union labor now in this country is that union labor desires to be treated with collectively and refused to recognize collective responsibility.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not, Mr. President, the honor of the acquaintance of the Secretary of Labor. I have no doubt he is doing a good work in various directions, but I had occasion to notice that on several occasions where the Secretary of Labor addressed laboring men at mass meetings of laboring men, where it is to be presumed a majority of them were nonunion men, he always addressed them as fellow labor unionists, which I thought was an unfortunate method that he had adopted, because he was talking to union men and to nonunion men, but apparently only recognized the one class.

Mr. FALL. In my judgment, and it is my personal judgment, the Secretary of Labor has rather conceived it to be his duty, and as I said it may be best for the country, that he should assist in unionizing labor in this country and use his office for that purpose.

He may be right about it; it may be that would be for the best. But this is not the time to try it. You must not undertake now to unsettle all the business of the country and to upset the labor of the country even more than it is now upset by seeking to force by the strong arm of the law in war time the nonunion laborer into a union-labor camp into which it has refused to enter in peace time.

Mr. President, I do not say that the Secretary of Labor would do this, but his entire effort has been along this line in time of peace. He has seemed to think and has declared that it was the duty of his department to prevent the crushing of labor by the building up of union labor, and I do not know but that I shall now quote some of his expressions as published in the

New York Times of November 13, 1913, in addressing the Union Labor Congress of Seattle.

Mr. President, I do this in all friendliness, so far as I am concerned; but I desire to express now my disagreement with some of the theories, at least, advanced by the present Secretary of Labor in addressing the conference of the American Federation of Labor at Seattle. He referred specifically to the then strike in the copper mines in Michigan and dwelt on it at great length and announced the most peculiar theory in reference to the individual right of property which has been announced by anyone of whom I have any knowledge except an anarchist.

As the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] just said, in addressing this organization—which, however, was a union-labor organization—he addressed them as "fellow unionists." Among other things, he said:

> The Department of Labor as now organized and directed will be utilized to cooperate with the great trade-union movement in its effort to elevate the standard of human society.
> One of the general duties imposed on the department is that of promoting the welfare of wageworkers.

I might stop to say, by way of comment, that that evidently referred to the general wage-working class, whether it belonged to the union or not. He continues:

> The one great specific duty imposed on the department is to act as a mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in trades disputes. There can be no mediation, there can be no conciliation between employers and employees, that does not presuppose collective bargaining, and there can not be collective bargaining that does not presuppose trade-unionism.

He speaks then of the situation at Calumet, Mich., and speaks of the great profits there. I have his words here. I do not think it is necessary to read them in full, but he speaks of the great profits they have made by one mine. He then concludes:

> They say their property is their own; that they have the right to do with it as they please. Maybe they have, but those who take that position have a false conception of the titles to property.

He proceeds to discuss titles to property. This is quoting from the New York Times, and I will call attention to the direct quotations from the Secretary as to what he said:

> The Secretary said every title was law created and law protected, and that, deprived of those laws, the property involved would be at the mercy of the first strong and cunning man who desired it.

Now, quoting from the Secretary:

> "Law had created those titles," he continued, "not primarily for the welfare of the man to whom it conveys it, but for the welfare of the community. Society has conceived, whether rightfully or wrongfully, that the best method of promoting the welfare of society is to convey titles to individuals in real estate and personal effects. It does it, however, not for the welfare of the individual, but for the welfare of the great mass of the people.
> "If any individual or corporation takes the ground that the property is his own, that he has the right to do with it as he pleases, and fails to take into consideration the fact that the title has only been conveyed to him as a trustee for the welfare of the society, then he is creating a condition that will cause society to modify or change these titles to property, as it has a perfect right to do whenever, in its judgment, it deems it for the welfare of society to do it."

This is the end of the quotation.

In giving the figures which he did in this speech the inference which he drew was that because of the profits which were made by individual owners of mines society had a right to deprive those individuals of their property; that the profits made constituted the measure of the right of society to confiscate property.

Of course, Mr. President, no man has a right to burn his house. In that far he is a trustee of his property for the welfare of society. It is true that in a time of need or peril the United States or Government or society itself can take over individual property, but that is for the needs of Government itself; but the right of condemnation and the measure of that right is not the profit made by the owner. Otherwise you might say when two men are managing farms alongside one another under exactly the same conditions and one makes a profit of 50 per cent and the other only 5 per cent, under the theory advanced by the Secretary of Labor the man making 50 per cent profit owes his property to society, and therefore society can confiscate it because of the profit he makes out of it. Of course, that is nonsense in so far as our present state of society is concerned, and it would not be listened to with very much patience until we have gone further than we have yet gone in the line of not only State socialism but in the line, I may say, of Russian socialism, or bolshevikism.

Mr. President, as I have said, the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey may be perfectly proper; it may be that it is best to vest in the Secretary of the Navy the power to provide housing facilities for all those engaged directly in naval work; it may be best to vest in the Secretary of War the housing facilities for all those engaged in arsenal work, as is expressly set forth in the bill, and not vest it in the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. President, I wander in the realms of speculation when I undertake to even imagine for a moment the result of the vast power contained in the few words following "navy yards of the United States," being the words "and in industries connected with and essential to the national defense." As I said in opening, practically every industry now——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Government is going to pay for the houses, is it not, at the various industrial plants?

Mr. FALL. I presume so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then why should it not be under the control and charge of a Government official?

Mr. FALL. That is exactly what I am proposing, that the President of the United States shall be vested with the authority contained in the bill and allocate it as under the circumstances may seem best.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is the difference between the Senator and myself. The Senator believes that the President should do it. I believe that the Secretary of the department having control of the activities of that department should do it.

Mr. FALL. Then to be consistent the Senator should insert "the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior," because the Secretary of the Interior has general charge of mines upon the public domain and the public lands and the Secretary of Agriculture has general charge of the agricultural industries of the country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator desires, I will yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I can not see why the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior should have anything to do with this matter. I can see why the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War should do it, because they are buying munitions from these industries, which need more employees, and therefore the Government is going to build the houses for the employees at these industries. Therefore it does directly have some relation to them.

Mr. FALL. I know the Senator is very seriously impressed with the great necessity for housing employees in his State engaged there.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield further to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FALL. I will yield in a moment, if the Senator will allow me to conclude what I was saying. There the Senator is undoubtedly very familiar with the housing of naval employees and those engaged in arsenal work and munitions work, and so forth. That is a matter of absolute necessity which we all recognize. The Senator is familiar with the conditions there; but there are 48 States and there are 96 Senators here. The Senators from the other States are somewhat familiar with conditions existing in their States, and they are looking somewhat to what might occur throughout the United States and not only around the navy yards or arsenals. It is with these matters in view that I am speaking as I am. I have the utmost respect for the Senator from New Jersey, and for his sincerity. I know his eye is fixed on the navy yards and the employees engaged therein, and he does not sufficiently, in my judgment, take into consideration the fact that this bill vests the broadest powers that were ever attempted to be vested along this line in any authority. To be perfectly frank with the Senator, I believe the Secretary of the Navy is possibly more incapable of handling agricultural labor than would be the Secretary of Labor himself. I do not think that the Secretary of War is capable of handling any class of labor at all except those who labor with their mouths. I now yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Bethlehem Steel Co. are now making 40 per cent of the munitions and heavy artillery for the Government. They could increase their capacity accordingly if $7,000,000 were spent there for housing. The contracts are made by the Secretary of War and not by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior. That is a war-industries plant. There are many other plants from which the War Department and Navy Department are buying munitions. If the Government is to assist these war-industrial plants, these private corporations, to increase their capacity by increasing the number of their employees through housing facilities provided by the Government, the Government, being the largest customer of those plants and needing an increased supply of munitions, should have control over those plants, and the department making the contract with those industrial plants should have the control over those houses. That is the point I make.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I understand the Senator, I think, and I am very unfortunate that I can not make him understand me. I understand, further, that under the law as it exists today the President of the United States can go to any private steel plant in the United States, the property of an individual, and commandeer it and take it over and operate it; he can fix the wages and pay the laborers and conduct the property. I understand that under the terms of this bill the President need not do that, but it will enable the Secretary of Labor to absolutely control that private plant by seizing all the housing facilities and taking charge of them.

Now, I am not in favor of vesting that power in the Secretary of Labor or the Secretary of the Navy, either. I am in favor of vesting it in the President of the United States, who stands before all the people of the United States as the representative of the administrative power in this country, and who sits, as he says, upon the true throne of administration in this country. I am willing to vest these extraordinary powers in him. Then the people will hold him responsible. I am willing to vest them in him, but not to provide that discrimination should be made or authority vested in this bill as between different classes of labor or laborers, because the people of the United States will hold him responsible.

There is a power far greater than that of the Congress of the United States. There is a power greater than that of the 48 States of the Union. There is a power greater than the President of the United States or the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, and that is the residuum of power left by the tenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States in the people of the United States. That power can only be exercised by public opinion. Public opinion is the expression of that great residuum of power to which we listen and to whose command the President of the United States may bow.

I regard the informing function of Congress as the greatest function at this time. Through debate upon just such bills as this the people can learn of something that is going on, and through the passage of such bills as that yesterday, the people of the United States can understand that the President of the United States, whom they have elected and placed in the White House, is responsible directly to them and that they do not necessarily hold responsible his subordinate officers.

Mr. President, I want to clear it away so that that public opinion constituting the greatest force in this country may reach the President unimpeded. If it is necessary to vest these vast powers in some one to save this country, if it is necessary to go to a man on horseback, a military dictatorship, while I hope that we may avoid that necessity, I am willing to go as far as anyone. However, I do not want little petty politics, the consideration of union labor or any other class of labor, to enter into this proposition at all; and I have confidence enough in the President of the United States even yet to believe that when he assumes the personal responsibility under the authority vested in him directly that he will not yield to any such consideration as against the general welfare of the people of the United States. I have no such confidence in some of his subordinate officers.

Now, Mr. President, as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, I move to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor," page 1, line 3, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "President."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I understand the vote will first come on the substitute offered by the Senator from New Mexico for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the correct situation.

Mr. SWANSON. There is this difference between the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico and the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey: The Senator from New Jersey simply desires to eliminate entirely the Secretary of Labor from any consideration or action in this matter and to confine it to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. The Senator from New Mexico would leave it to the President so that he may select the agencies that he thinks best to administer the law. The committee reported to give the power to the Secretary of Labor under the direction of the President, which is practically the same thing as the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, I do not think the Secretary of Labor ought to be eliminated from having a part in this work. Under the existing conditions the Secretary of Labor has a large employment bureau, and if any of these large plants—navy yards, arsenals, or any of the great industrial plants—need labor the Secretary of Labor, with the agency he has, goes over the country and tries to get mechanics, tries to get labor. It was through his efforts to supply labor for these plants that he realized the conditions which exist at the great industrial centers. The labor would not remain at work. They would get an expert mechanic and he would stay there 30, 60, or 90 days and then leave. Then they would have to go over and over the condition in what is known as turnover of labor. The Secretary of Labor made an examination with money furnished him by the President. He ascertained that the greatest trouble at the navy yards and arsenals and these industrial plants where war munitions are being manufactured is the deficiency in labor, the great turnover of labor, and that was occasioned by lack of housing facilities. He made a report, and that report was then taken to the Cabinet. Then there was another report, under money furnished by the President, of all the industrial centers, arsenals, navy yards, and where people had contracts with the War and Navy Departments. We have been complaining at the delay that has been occasioned. These reports were made and they are confidential—any Senator can see them—as to the conditions at the navy yards and arsenals and the places where guns, powder, munitions, and other things are being contracted for by the Government. The general impression is that from 25 to 50 per cent increase of output could be made if housing facilities were given.

This bill was introduced in the House. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House reported it unanimously after a long and full hearing of the various plans and purposes; and it was reported to the House of Representatives, and I think passed that body with but 17 votes against it. It came to the committee of which I am chairman. We had the Secretary of Labor before us. He told us of the plans, purposes, and intentions, and I wish to say that I do not think anybody who appeared before the committee made a better impression than the Secretary of Labor as to the conditions and how he expected to remedy them. Those hearings have been printed and have been here for two weeks.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand that the Secretary of Labor is to have control of the labor in the yards and arsenals?

Mr. SWANSON. Not the labor; he simply procures labor. For instance, where they need 5,000 workmen he tries to get them. He tries to ascertain where there is a superabundance of labor. He has been trying to do that ever since the war started.

Mr. LODGE. But he has no control over it.

Mr. SWANSON. He has no control over it. I never said that he had control. In doing this work he ascertains the conditions at the plant. He made a report that there was a great turnover of labor. You get hundreds of mechanics and you get experts. They were at first green, not acquainted with the work, but many experts would leave and others would come, and this is due to the housing conditions. Great Britain has spent $700,000,000 for housing at munition plants. I understand this matter was discussed in the Cabinet. It was discussed by the Secretary of Labor and by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and a conclusion was reached that the Secretary of Labor is the best person to administer it. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy agreed that the Secretary of Labor should do it under the direction of the President.

I understand that they have already selected a man for the Navy Department who will represent the Navy and a man for the War Department to represent the Army and a man from the Shipping Board whom the Secretary of Labor has selected. If left to the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy there would be three to administer it. I have no objection to leaving it to the President and let the President select them, but I am unwilling to have the Secretary of Labor entirely eliminated when he has made these surveys, knows the conditions, and is engaged now in getting employees to go to the plants. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey would eliminate him entirely and get rid of the work he has done. He has done this work efficiently and he impressed me very favorably, indeed.

Consequently, as between the substitute offered by the Senator from New Mexico and the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey I shall vote for the substitute offered by the Senator from New Mexico, because the Senator from New Mexico proposes to leave it to the President. That does not necessarily exclude the Secretary of Labor, who has done great work. If the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey prevails, the Secretary of Labor is excluded, the work he has done is eliminated, and the work that he has done has been valuable and efficient. He has been a very great source of strength to the Army and Navy at the arsenals and munition plants engaged in war production. He knows the conditions. What he has done is valuable and he should be included in it. I think it is wrong to endeavor to eliminate him from this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, several Senators are absent from the Chamber who wish to be present when the vote is taken, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	New	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Hardwick	Overman	Sutherland
Calder	Hitchcock	Page	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Trammell
Dillingham	King	Reed	Underwood
Fall	Kirby	Shafroth	Vardaman
Fernald	Lodge	Sheppard	Warren
Fletcher	McKellar	Sherman	Watson
France	McLean	Shields	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is therefore shown not to be present, and the Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HENDERSON and Mr. NUGENT answered to their names when called.

Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. TILLMAN, and Mr. JOHNSON of California entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the adoption of the substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the effect of which will be to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor" and to insert the words "President of the United States," that being the substitute proposed to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from New Jersey offers his amendment to the text of the bill, and for that amendment the Senator from New Mexico has offered a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair only stated the effect of the substitute to be to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor" and to insert the words "President of the United States."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask that the substitute be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN offers an amendment on page 1, line 3, after the word "the," to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor" and to insert "Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy," and Mr. FALL offers as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor," on page 1, line 3, and to insert the words "President of the United States" in lieu thereof.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the vote will first come upon the substitute proposed by the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will first come upon the substitute to insert the words "President of the United States." The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that the amendment proposed by the committee, to insert the words "under the direction of the President of the United States," would seem now to be surplusage and should be disagreed to. They are now neither germane nor necessary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Chair refer to my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all. The Senator's amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I merely wish the right to offer the amendment in the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. The words "under the direction of the President" should be eliminated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are not necessary.

Mr. LODGE. I may not have caught it, and I ask has the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, as amended by the substitute of the Senator from New Mexico, been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. The RECORD will not show it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey as amended by the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment, which does not appear now to be necessary. Without objection, it is rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when this bill was previously under consideration I called the attention of the Senator from Virginia to what I thought was unfortunate phraseology. The Senator was not in a very amiable frame of mind on that day, and he paid little attention to my suggestion.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from New Hampshire evidently was not observing; he certainly had some one else in view.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want now to make a suggestion, to which I think the Senator from Virginia will agree. I suggest to transfer the words "and their families," on page 1, at the end of line 8, to come in after the words "United States," in line 7. I trust the Senator will read the language, and I think he will see that that will be a desirable change.

Mr. THOMAS. Should not the words come in after the word "workers," in line 6, so as to read "such industrial workers and their families"?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; as I suggest, it would read "such industrial workers as are engaged in arsenals and navy yards of the United States and their families." I think the words "and their families" would better come in after the words "United States."

Mr. SWANSON. It will be all right in that way. I will say that this language came over in the bill from the other House, and we did not feel that we should act as a committee of censorship on that body.

Mr. GALLINGER. I feel like amending any bill that comes here from the other House, especially one that is drawn by a blacksmith, as I think this bill was.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move the amendment which I have stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, in section 1, page 1, line 6, after the word "arsenals," to insert "and navy yards," so as to read:

And other community facilities for such industrial workers as are engaged in arsenals and navy yards of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, in the same section, on the same page, line 9, before the word "employees," to insert "also," so as to read:

And also employees of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a very important amendment was adopted when this bill was previously under consideration, being first offered by myself and afterwards by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. In view of the action of the Senate a few moments ago, whereby all that had been accomplished heretofore in the consideration of this bill was set aside, I now ask for a reconsideration of the amendment that was adopted upon the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, a copy of which I understand the Secretary has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole matter, as the Chair understands, has been reconsidered.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that; and for that reason I am offering the amendment hitherto offered by the Senator from Minnesota and accepted by the Senate in order that we may adopt it again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 it is proposed to strike out the proviso following the word "constructed," in line 15, and to insert the following:

Provided, That colleges, museums, libraries, State or municipal buildings and the furnishings in private dwellings shall not be acquired except by contract, nor shall any occupied dwelling be taken under the powers in this act given except by contract unless the necessity thereof shall be determined by a judge of the circuit or district court of the United States exercising jurisdiction in the locality on petition setting forth the reason and necessity for such taking; the hearing on such petition shall be summary in character, and the determination of such judge shall be final.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], proposed as a substitute for the committee amendment beginning on line 15, page 2, and extending to the bottom of the page.

Mr. SWANSON. I accept that amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment, to come in after the word "final," which I believe is the last word in the proposed substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment just stated, following the word "final," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "but in no event shall any occupied dwelling house be taken except by contract, unless such dwelling be upon lands desired for the construction of a Government structure."

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that being adopted for consideration by the conferees. I think it is all right.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the amendment to the amendment again be read.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that the entire amendment be read with the amendment which I have proposed added to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That colleges, museums, libraries, state or municipal buildings and the furnishings in private dwellings shall not be acquired except by contract, nor shall any occupied dwelling be taken under the powers in this act given except by contract unless the necessity thereof shall be determined by a judge of the circuit or district court of the United States exercising jurisdiction in the locality on petition setting forth the reason and necessity for such taking; the hearing on such petition shall be summary in character and the determination of such judge shall be final, but in no event shall any occupied dwelling house be taken except by contract unless such dwelling be upon lands desired for the construction of a Government structure.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator to insert the word "private," so as to read "private occupied dwelling house," because in some cases where there are summer hotels, for instance, it is the intention to take them——

Mr. JONES of Washington. "Private occupied dwelling house"—that will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. SWANSON. But there is an intention in the case of some of the summer hotels which are not occupied except for two or three months during the year, and which are capable of housing hundreds and thousands of workmen, to take them for the purposes intended by this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all right.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to state the purpose of the amendment in just a word.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The purpose of the amendment is to prevent the taking of a dwelling house, putting its occupants out, and merely putting somebody else in that house.

Mr. SWANSON. There is no intention of doing that; that was testified to before the committee; and I have no objection to the amendment if it is made to apply only to private residences.

Mr. JONES of Washington. "Occupied private dwelling house," I think, will cover the idea.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the amendment to the amendment is rather contradictory of the preceding portion of the amendment. The suggestion of the Senator from Washington, if I correctly apprehend it, virtually eliminates private dwellings from the operation of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. THOMAS. I may be; but that is the effect of it, as it appears to me.

Mr. SWANSON. There is an exception in case it is intended to erect thereon a Government structure.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I understand that; but under the amendment which was offered on a preceding occasion by the Senator from Minnesota, occupied dwellings could be taken either by contract or by an order of the district judge of the particular district in a summary proceeding.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They can be taken here on the order of a judge if the land is necessary for the purposes covered by the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. But only under those circumstances.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is true.

Mr. THOMAS. And that eliminates from the bill all other structures which are used for dwellings.

Mr. SWANSON. I think it would be well to carry out the purpose of the Senator from Washington, but the objection of the Senator from Colorado should certainly be considered. It might be well to insert in the amendment to the amendment a qualification to the effect that a private dwelling can be taken if the surrounding land is desired by the Government. For instance, such a case as this may arise, and the Government ought not to be subject to blackmail or extortion: In some of these places it will be necessary to have thousands of employees in order to insure the production of war material, and I think it is expected to build in some instances small villages or towns to house and take care of the employees. Now, there might be five or six houses in such a place, and under the language as drawn, unless the Government intended to build over those lands, they could not take the dwellings. There is no purpose in any of the cities to transfer a house from A and give it to B; it has been testified that that is not the intention; but there are certain cases where the Government will probably desire to build two or three thousand houses, and the conditions might be such that it would be necessary to provide waterworks or an electric plant on the land occupied by a private dwelling, and the proposed amendment to the amendment might really destroy the whole program in a given case unless it were so framed as to take care of such a situation. If the amendment is so drawn as to take care of cases like that, I think it would be a very proper amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what was intended. I did not have before me the original amendment, which was adopted some days ago, so as to frame the amendment to the amendment in connection with it, and I drew the amendment to the amendment in a hurry; but the Senator from Virginia has stated the idea that I want to cover, and I would be perfectly willing to have it adopted in some such form and let it go to conference. Any language that will cover the idea that I had in mind will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest that the amendment be read. If the Senator from Colorado is right, it might be very embarrassing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment proposed by Mr. THOMAS it is proposed to insert the following:

But in no event shall any occupied private dwelling house be taken except by contract, unless such dwelling be upon lands desired for the construction of a Government structure.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest that it be amended so as to read "unless such dwelling and surrounding land," and so forth.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has suggested to me that the amendment which was adopted as offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] some days ago provides an opportunity for a hearing by the owner of the premises involved and the right to file an answer to the summary proceedings. That does not appear in the amendment read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary only read the amendment to the amendment, the Chair will state. The amendment was proposed, and then an amendment to the amendment, which was read.

Mr. THOMAS. But the Secretary read the amendment which had been adopted when this bill was up last week, and that amendment the Senator from New Mexico advises me was sufficiently broad to permit the owner of the property to file an answer and be heard. As read, the amendment does not seem to have that provision in it.

Mr. LODGE. That was put in the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota some days ago.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; but it was not in the amendment read by the Secretary.

Mr. LODGE. Then, it was incorrectly read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment again.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I call the attention of Senators who were present when the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota was adopted some days ago to the fact that I suggested at that time that there should be some notice given of the hearing. So, after the word "petition," as it appeared in the committee amendment on page 22, my recollection is that there was inserted by unanimous consent the words "and after notice," so that it read:

unless the necessity thereof shall be determined by a judge of the circuit or district court of the United States exercising jurisdiction in the locality, on petition and after notice, setting forth the reasons and necessity for such taking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado desire to propose the amendment with the words now suggested by the Senator from New Mexico included?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; Mr. President, I think those words should be included in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then, the amendment will be considered as so modified.

Mr. FALL. The words "and after notice" should be inserted after the word "petition."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the original amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That colleges, museums, libraries, State or municipal buildings, and the furnishings in private dwellings shall not be acquired except by contract, nor shall any occupied dwelling be taken under the powers in this act given except by contract, unless the necessity thereof shall be determined by a judge of the circuit or district of the United States exercising jurisdiction in the locality, on petition setting forth the reason and necessity for such taking; the hearing on such petition shall be upon notice to the owner and occupant of such dwelling, and the determination of such judge shall be final.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That seems to include the words indicated by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SWANSON. Now I ask the Secretary to read the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following to the amendment just read:

But in no event shall any occupied private dwelling house and the adjacent land be taken except by contract, unless such dwelling be upon lands desired for the construction of a Government structure.

Mr. SWANSON. That is wrong.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The words "adjacent land" have been put in the wrong place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That seems to conflict in any event with the purpose of the main amendment, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is only stating his own construction of the amendment. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Let it be again read.

Mr. FALL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FALL. The amendment which was adopted last week has just been read and appears to be satisfactory, except in so far as it is desired to amend it now; but the amendment which has been adopted by the Senate now is not the amendment which was adopted last week with the provision inserting the words "after notice."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is laboring under a misapprehension. No amendment has been adopted. An amendment that was heretofore adopted and then reconsidered has been proposed again by the Senator from Colorado and is now pending. To that amendment the Senator from Washington has offered an amendment.

Mr. FALL. What I desire to know is whether the amendment now pending is the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota as amended last week?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the same.

Mr. SWANSON. It is the same without amendment.

Mr. FALL. The original amendment of the Senator from Minnesota did not contain the words "after notice," and the original amendment was amended in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the same amendment as modified and perfected.

Mr. SWANSON. It is the amendment that was finally adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Let the amendment be stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would the Senator like the whole amendment to be read?

Mr. SWANSON. No; simply the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the Secretary read it, and then that the Senator from Virginia put in the words he desires at the proper place. It is pretty hard to express the idea.

The Secretary read as follows:

But in no event shall any occupied dwelling house be taken except by contract unless such dwelling be upon lands desired for the construction of Government property.

Mr. SWANSON. "Or adjacent land."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I may be obtuse, but I can not escape the conviction that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington defeats, in part, the purpose that is to be conserved by the amendment which I revived.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me, the amendment as adopted by the Senate as amended permitted the Government to take a house from A and give it to B if the court decided the Government might use it.

Mr. THOMAS. Precisely.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Washington desires to eliminate that authority, except in cases where the Government desires to take that private residence and construct there or upon adjacent lands buildings of its own. In a case like that the Government could take the private residence under the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. That fortifies my understanding of the amendment. Now, Mr. President, if housing is a matter of such great concern, I think we ought not to limit the Government to the taking of structures which are not occupied, but we should permit the Government to take those which are occupied and which the Government needs far more, perhaps, than the occupants.

The amendment which was adopted the other day made ample provision whereby such structures, if needed, could be secured by contract. Failing in an agreement, a summary proceeding was provided for, and the decision of the judge of the United States court having jurisdiction of that proceeding is summarily made, and is final. Now, the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington certainly destroys that part of the amendment, because in no case can an occupied dwelling be taken under this law if the Senator's addition to the amendment is adopted, except by contract, unless in cases where the land may be needed as a part of a general system of construction.

I do not think we should narrow the operation of this bill in so small a compass, because it will certainly prove inconvenient, if not extremely annoying, and it may perhaps in some places defeat the immediate operation of the bill. I do not think the addition to the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say just a word.

I do not see what conditions could arise in connection with the war that should cause us to take one family out of a house and put another family in it. The sole purpose of this amendment is just to prevent the exercise of power in that way. But there may be cases where there is a tract of land that the Government wants, upon which there is a private dwelling occupied by a family. This amendment permits the taking of that private dwelling for the purpose of putting a Government structure upon it and any surrounding lands that there may be; and that is the situation that it is hoped to meet. I do want to limit the general amendment proposed to that extent. I think it ought to be done; and, as the chairman has said, it was testified in the hearing that they do not want the power to put A out of his house and put B in it.

The language of this amendment, of course, was framed hurriedly; and while it may not exactly cover the situation, I think it could be worked out so as to meet the idea of the chairman, which is the very idea that I want to meet.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am gratified to know that I understand the object of the Senator perfectly. I disagree with him in his conclusion that there are not conditions, and may not hereafter be conditions, which would justify the ousting of one family from a house and a provision for its occupancy by some other family. We judge of these matters to some degree by conditions here in the city of Washington, which perhaps is an extreme example of congestion. There are a great many people in the city of Washington who might just as well be somewhere else, and, so far as the welfare of the country is concerned, they ought to be somewhere else.

In saying that, I do not intend to reflect upon that class of people; but I suppose Washington is to-day the most congested city in the Union, and it is due to the very rapid expansion of our various bureaus and organizations consequent upon our declaration of war. There are a great many people in Washington who are here because they like to be here. The excitement, the surroundings, and the atmosphere of Washington are congenial to them. That is all right in times of peace, but in times like these that class of people, well to do for the most part, can better serve their country by being somewhere else, and if they are not disposed to go willingly, then the Government ought to be empowered to take the houses which they occupy and devote them to the shelter of the employees of the Government who must be here; and in that event, of course, the people whose business does not require them to be here must go somewhere else. Indeed, I think it would be a very good idea if the President of the United States should issue a proclamation requesting all people in the city of Washington who do not permanently reside here, and who have no business here, to get out. That would relieve the congestion and enable a great many people who hardly have places where they can find shelter now to secure some sort of a habitation. It would be better for the Government and it would be better for the people against whom the proclamation is aimed.

In this city, therefore, Mr. President, the power should be given to whoever is to administer this bill to go to such occupants and say: "Here, I want to make a contract with you for the occupancy of this house. You are not obliged to be here, but the people for whom I want it must be here; and if I can not contract for possession, then I must summon you before the judge of the United States court and let him determine whether the necessities of the public are or are not greater than your convenience."

Of course, if this proposed amendment to the amendment is adopted, that method of relief in cities like Washington will be practically eliminated from the operation of this bill; and as a result those in whose behalf we propose to enact this legislation must wait until structures can be erected for them, and they will be unable to obtain shelter until they are erected. If housing is so much needed, Mr. President—if shelter for the employees of the Government, the workmen at these various industrial institutions, can only be obtained through Government aid—then we ought to pass a bill that will enable those administering the law to take houses which are already in existence as well as to build houses for those who are to come.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Upon a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Chair advise me what disposition has been made of the committee amendment on page 2, lines 6 and 7?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not yet been acted upon. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is the committee amendment proposing to strike out, on page 2, lines 6 and 7, the words "local transportation and other community facilities and parts thereof."

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, as I understand, the object of this amendment is to permit the President of the United States to take over local transportation and other community facilities, or parts thereof, in any given place where it may be found necessary to provide housing facilities for Government employees. It would seem to me that this language is very necessary in the bill.

I recall that when the Senate considered legislation dealing with the construction of houses for men employed in the shipyards of the Nation, the Senate also considered another bill dealing with the transportation question. For several weeks I objected to the consideration of that transportation legislation until, after a careful examination of the whole subject, I became convinced that it was necessary to permit the Shipping Board, if they were to go into the housing business, also to have some authority to take over transportation facilities. As the result of this legislation, we have been able to avoid taking up this housing question in many places where it would otherwise be necessary. Some local trolley lines have been taken over and some have been extended, and we have been able to take men to shipyards located several miles from cities where houses could be had, thereby avoiding the expenditure of large sums of money for the construction of houses.

I think this committee amendment ought not to be agreed to. I really believe that it would be better to have the language in the bill than to have it stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, lines 13 and 14, it is proposed to strike out the words "local transportation, and other community facilities."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next committee amendment is on page 3, lines 3 and 4, where it is proposed to strike out the words "local transportation, and other community facilities."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 7, before the word "lien," it is proposed to insert the word "first."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, lines 10 and 11, it is proposed to strike out the words "local transportation, and other community facilities."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment, to go at the end of line 13, paragraph (d).

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, preceding that I should like to offer an amendment, which I think the chairman of the committee will agree ought to go in the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I withhold my amendment until the Senator offers his.

Mr. GALLINGER. I send the amendment to the desk, and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 8, after the word "money," it is proposed to add the following:

And provided further, That in no case shall any property hereby acquired be given away, nor shall rents be furnished free; but the rental charges shall be reasonable and just as between the employees and the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to that. That is the purpose of those who will administer the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] asked me to present an amendment, which he understood the chairman of the committee would accept.

Mr. LODGE. My amendment comes in on line 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is possibly a little fuller than the one to which the Senator from Washington refers and is practically of the same character.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have my amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 13, after the word "determine," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no loan shall be made at a less rate of interest than 5 per cent per annum: And provided further, That no loan shall be made and no house or money given under this act to any person not an American citizen.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. LODGE. Does it relate to this amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It may relate to that amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from New Mexico, as I understand, wanted an amendment inserted to the effect that the loans must be secured.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That they shall be properly secured by lien, mortgage, or otherwise.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I think that ought to be put in, to make it harmonize with the preceding paragraph—"without reserving a first lien."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it proposed as an amendment there?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts be read, and then he will see where it would be proper for the language to come in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 13, after the word "determine," it is proposed to add the following:

Provided, That no loan shall be made at a less rate of interest than 5 per cent per annum: And provided further, That no loan shall be made and no house or money given under this act to any person not an American citizen.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that that would properly come in after the words "per annum"—"and properly secured by lien, mortgage, or otherwise."

Mr. LODGE. It would go in right after the word "loan."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's suggestion is adopted as a part of his amendment. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that it be read in its modified form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. As modified, the amendment reads:

Provided, That no loan shall be made at a less rate of interest than 5 per cent per annum, and such loan shall be properly secured by lien, mortgage, or otherwise: And provided further, That no loan shall be made and no house or money given under this act to any person not an American citizen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator having charge of the bill to the words "or otherwise," which appear on page 2, line 5, and the same words upon line 11 of page 2. By reading the first clause their connection with the sentence in both cases will be apparent:

To purchase, acquire by lease, construct, requisition, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise such houses, buildings, furnishings, improvements—

And so forth. Mr. President, I am not aware of any other manner of acquiring property than by purchase, lease, construction, requisition, or condemnation.

Mr. SWANSON. That was put in there because it is generally put in legal documents, to cover gifts.

Mr. THOMAS. I would prefer to see the words "or gift" inserted, then. The word "otherwise" is an extremely broad one.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will move to amend by putting in the words "or by gift," I have no objection, and then the words "or otherwise" can be eliminated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment proposed is agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. If that amendment is accepted, of course, I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate in its discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, lines 6 and 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "what is commonly known as the Maltby Building, as well as all other" and to insert "all," so as to read:

(c) To take possession of, alter, repair, improve, and suitably arrange for living purposes to be used under the terms of this act all houses on square 633, owned by the United States, together with any other houses in the District of Columbia owned by the Government and not now occupied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, recurring to the amendment adopted upon the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I should like to have the Chair state where that amendment comes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that it was proposed to strike out "or otherwise" and insert "by gift."

Mr. SWANSON. Wherever those words occur in the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. They occur in two or three places.

Mr. THOMAS. And on page 2, line 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Wherever the expression occurs.

Mr. SWANSON. Wherever it occurs; I hope the Secretary will make the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered. Wherever it occurs, the Secretary will strike out "or otherwise" and insert "by gift."

Mr. THOMAS. And also on page 4, line 20.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in connection with the part of paragraph (e), where we have just stricken out the words "Maltby Building," and where it goes on "all houses on square 633, owned by the United States, together with any other houses in the District of Columbia owned by the Government and not now occupied," I should like to ask the Senator why the Government should not have a right to take and use the unoccupied embassies of Austria and Germany? I should not think of proposing that we should take the property of the late ambassadors here, as Germany has taken the property of Mr. Gerard, because I do not think we would want to be thieves even in time of war; but why should we not use those great unoccupied houses for our own purposes?

Mr. SWANSON. The bill does not include any specific houses. None have been named.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; but this is limited to houses owned by the Government and not now occupied.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, this was simply the Maltby Building that was included, and we expected to change that into a residential building. It was ascertained that it would take $120,000.

Mr. LODGE. I was not objecting to that.

Mr. SWANSON. The other part was to take buildings out here that belonged to the Government.

Mr. LODGE. So I understand.

Mr. SWANSON. We have not named any buildings here; and if any buildings are to be condemned or acquired, by purchase or otherwise, in the District of Columbia, by the provisions of the bill before the act becomes operative they must make a specific report to Congress and Congress must make the appropriations. If the Senator desires these buildings to be taken under the provisions of this bill he can have a report made. They are authorized to spend $10,000,000 to sequester buildings in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator misconceives my purpose. I only wanted to give the Government the authority if they have not the authority already.

Mr. SWANSON. The Government has authority under this bill.

Mr. LODGE. Then I will allow the suggestion to stand that we use those two embassies.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, what action has been taken by the Imperial German Government as to the property of Ambassador Gerard?

Mr. LODGE. As I understand, they have seized his property. He had no house there.

Mr. PHELAN. His personal property?

Mr. LODGE. His personal property, which was stored there, has been seized. I am not proposing to seize any of the personal property of the Austrian ambassador or the German ambassador; I do not know that they have any here; but there are those two large, empty houses. Why should we not have the benefit of them during the war?

Mr. PHELAN. Is the fee in the respective Governments?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; they own them. I understand so. I know that is the case with the German Embassy, and I think it is the case with the Austrian Embassy.

Mr. PHELAN. It would be like the acquisition of foreign territory here.

Mr. SWANSON. We have an alien enemy act here which permits all that property to be controlled. That bill was passed long before this bill was introduced. It is alien enemy property, and a law has been passed which will enable the Government to dispose of it.

Mr. LODGE. Well, I hope they will; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is on page 3, line 21, where, after the words "Secretary of Labor," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "with the approval of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds," so as to read:

The Secretary of Labor, with the approval of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, shall, in the construction of buildings in the District of Columbia, make use of any lands owned by the Government of the United States deemed by him to be suitable for the purpose—

And so forth.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to strike out "the Secretary of Labor" and insert "the President"; also to strike out "with the approval of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds."

Mr. LODGE. In other words, the Senator withdraws that amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. I withdraw that amendment and move to substitute the word "President" for the words "Secretary of Labor."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will not the chairman of the committee make that motion apply to the entire bill—that wherever the words "Secretary of Labor" occur they shall be stricken out and the word "President" inserted?

Mr. SWANSON. We can do that as we reach the different places in the bill.

Mr. FALL. Wherever the phrase occurs in the bill, I suggest that "Secretary of Labor" be stricken out and "President" inserted.

Mr. SWANSON. That should be done in each case as we reach it. We are reading the entire bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to withdraw the amendment proposing to insert "with the approval of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that amendment offered by the committee is rejected. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is on page 4——

Mr. SWANSON. On page 4, line 3, I move to strike out "the Secretary of Labor" and insert "the President."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "Secretary of Labor" and insert the word "President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Also, on line 13, I move to strike out "Secretary of Labor" and insert "President."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. What has become of the committee amendment in lines 6, 7, 8, and 9?

Mr. FALL. I suggest to the chairman that that amendment should be made on line 18 also.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; also on line 18.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is an amendment here that we have not dealt with, striking out the proviso in lines 6, 7, 8, and 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has not been reached yet.

Mr. LODGE. We have gone to lines 13 and 18. I thought we had passed over it.

The SECRETARY. On lines 6, 7, 8, and 9 it is proposed to strike out the words:

Provided, That houses erected by the Government under the authority of this act shall be of only a temporary character whenever it is practicable.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I hope the chairman of the committee will not insist on that amendment.

The chairman of the committee the other day, on April 17, in discussing this very proposition said that it was the purpose of the committee to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, as the bill read at that time, to erect either permanent or temporary buildings, as he might deem proper. In my judgment, that is the way it should be; but this amendment, striking out the language read by the Secretary, would take away from the department or the President, as the bill now reads, the authority to put up temporary structures; and it seems to me the only construction which could be placed upon the bill, with that language eliminated, would be to have all the structures permanent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the language "whenever it is practicable" would give the President the right to construct a permanent building if it was imperative, so I agree with the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the observation of the Senator from New Hampshire is absolutely correct. Of course, we are only providing for these housing privileges because of the necessities of the war. I can understand, where we have arsenals and other industries connected with the War or Navy Departments, that it might be advisable to have permanent, substantial structures, and wherever such a case exists I want the structures to be permanent; but in many places there will be additional labor required for a year or two years or at most during the continuance of the war, and it does seem to me that common prudence would suggest that there should be nothing more than a temporary structure in cases of that kind.

A little matter came to my attention the other day. My colleague [Mr. HARDING] referred to it on yesterday. The committee having charge of the housing projects under the pending legislation prepared certain specifications for building, and they had printed certain regulations in which it was provided that none but a very excellent quality of cast-iron sewer pipe should be used. It so happens that in my own State there are large concerns that are interested in the manufacture of vitrified sewer pipe. This piping is approved by nearly all of the municipalities in our State and elsewhere in that vicinity. It may be that there are certain localities where none but steel or cast-iron pipe should be used; but it certainly does seem to me that any pipe should be used which would meet with the approval of the local authorities. The vitrified sewer pipe is much cheaper than the iron or steel pipe; and why any man in charge of this building project should say that only iron or steel pipe can be used is beyond my comprehension. If they were to build all permanent structures there might be some excuse for it, but I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will not insist upon that amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this provision in the House bill says that they shall put up temporary buildings wherever practicable. It leaves a certain amount of discretion, but it would make it the subject of a great deal of comment if the authorities put up any permanent buildings anywhere. The language was stronger than was really deemed advisable where they wanted to put up permanent buildings. A part of the employees in the arsenals and navy yards are willing at once to buy their buildings, pay a certain amount of cash, and make the remaining payments in installments. They had an idea that in places like that they ought to put up permanent buildings. A permanent wooden structure can be put up nearly as quickly as a temporary building, and the Government would not lose any money. It was thought wise to leave it discretionary with them to put up either temporary or permanent buildings, as they thought the situation required.

Mr. POMERENE. Then why did not——

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, take a place where you expect the population to be reduced one-half when the war is over. It would be absolute folly to put up permanent buildings there. They would not sell for more than temporary buildings and yet the cost is three and four times what it would be in ordinary times. They expect to put up temporary buildings at such places, while at the Boston Navy Yard, the Philadelphia Navy Yard, the Mare Island Navy Yard, at Charleston, and Norfolk they can put up permanent buildings and the employees are willing to buy them.

All that is desired is that there shall be a discretion lodged with them to determine whether it is wise at a given place to put up permanent or temporary buildings. The language was such that they felt that unless it was impracticable or nearly impossible to put up temporary buildings they would have to put up permanent buildings.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator who felt that way?

Mr. SWANSON. Those who are to have the administration of it who appeared before the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Who are they?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Eidlitz and others.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, Mr. President; and I think I can shed a little bit of light upon that. Some of these material men came to see me and wanted me to support this committee amendment, because they said they wanted permanent structures everywhere, and quoted the British authorities to the effect that they had discovered that none but permanent structures should be used.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I have not seen any material man. No material man appeared before the committee. The Secretary of Labor, in discussing this matter, said that Great Britain spent $700,000,000 for permanent buildings. He did not think it practicable in America, because Great Britain is a small country and permanent buildings with the large population could be quickly disposed of, and that most of the buildings would be temporary, but there are places where permanent buildings ought to be put up. Unless you are going to have an immense loss, if you put up temporary buildings in Philadelphia, there would be an absolute loss; if you put them up at Mare Island it would be a loss; if you put them up at Puget Sound it would be a loss. But in the majority of places the buildings should be temporary. I find lumber people are anxious to have temporary buildings. No material men and no lumbermen appeared before the committee or applied to me. The only suggestion which was made was by people who expect to administer this law, who think they ought to have discretion to take what is best for each place. If the Senator will offer an amendment which will do that, that is all I desire.

Mr. POMERENE. The language of the House bill if left alone will provide exactly what the Senator is now working for.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to this language. All I want is to have the discretion left with them.

Mr. POMERENE. This would leave the discretion with them.

Mr. SWANSON. But it is so strong that it would be hard to put up permanent buildings anywhere.

Mr. POMERENE. No; not at all.

Mr. SWANSON. It reads this way:

Provided, That houses erected by the Government under the authority of this act shall be of either permanent or temporary character, as is most practicable.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not any objection to the language if it assumes that form.

Mr. SWANSON. I would prefer to eliminate it. Otherwise it might leave it that they should prefer permanent buildings.

Mr. POMERENE. I think common horse sense used by the department and by those in charge of this building will determine the question as to whether we ought to have permanent buildings in a given locality.

Mr. SWANSON. I would suggest this amendment, and it is all anyone desires:

Provided, That the houses erected by the Government under authority of this act shall be of either permanent or temporary character, as is most practicable.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am going to venture to suggest to the Senator, though his suggestion may be better than mine, that it should read:

That houses erected by the Government under the authority of this act shall be of a temporary character unless otherwise determined by the President.

Mr. SWANSON. That would lead to long delays, I fear. There are a great many of these employees who have the money to pay in part for the houses and all they ask is the privilege of purchasing these buildings. It will not cost the Government anything. At some of the places the buildings are going to be permanent, but it seems to me wise to leave it to be determined whether they shall be temporary or permanent according to the conditions.

I offer this as a substitute:

Provided, That houses erected by the Government under the authority of this act shall be of permanent or of temporary character as is most practicable.

Mr. KING. Will not the Senator accept this?—

Provided, That houses erected by the Government under the authority of this act shall be of only a temporary character, except where the interests of the Government will be best subserved.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection whatever to that amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. That sounds better.

Mr. SWANSON. I will accept it.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment be read as now stated by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. Strike out and insert:

Provided, That houses erected by the Government under the authority of this act shall be of only a temporary character, except where the interests of the Government will be best subserved.

Mr. GALLINGER. Be best subserved by what?

Mr. POMERENE. By buildings of a permanent character.

Mr. KING. I thought that was covered by the language of the bill.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Ohio has said. I have prepared an amendment along that line which I think perhaps covers the ground somewhat more fully than that offered by the Senator from Utah, if the Senator from Ohio will yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, at the end of line 13, insert the following:

Provided, That where it shall be necessary temporary structures may be erected, but that where and when possible, in the judgment of the President, permanent houses shall be constructed, such houses to be located and constructed in accordance with plans to be approved by the President on suitable sites convenient to, or in the neighborhood of, navy yards, arsenals, coast defenses, ship or naval bases, Government yards, or other plants, such structures to constitute, whenever possible, a part of the permanent plan or system of national defense.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the amendment goes as far as we ought to go in limiting this work. That shows a preference for temporary buildings unless the Government interests would be subserved by permanent ones, and that, I think, is right.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having charge of the bill if we have made any provision for a bureau of housing and transportation?

Mr. SWANSON. I know of none except as the Shipping Board may have organized one.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That would be organized, I take it, under this bill.

Mr. SWANSON. The bill would give the power to effect an organization to carry out its purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Secretary of Labor is not waiting for us to pass a bill in order to establish a bureau.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say, in justice to the Secretary of Labor, that he has been very efficient and capable in this as in other matters during the war.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not questioning that.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator may not have been here when I stated that the President gave him, I understand, $60,000 out of the appropriation to make this investigation, and he made these reports as to conditions, getting the material which justified him in recommending to Congress the passage of this act.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a letter here with this letterhead:

Office of the Director, Department of Labor, office of the Secretary, Washington. Bureau of Industrial Housing and Transportation, 613 G Street NW.

This is a letter with reference to the matter the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] referred to a moment ago, and I am simply calling attention to it, because I think many Senators may be interested in it. I received telegrams from some vitrified pipe or brick people in my State protesting against putting out specifications of the buildings requiring the use of iron pipe only for sewage purposes connected with the building. It seems to me that the director of this housing bureau, according to the information they had, prepared specifications that would exclude everything except iron pipe. Of course that would give the iron-pipe people an absolute monopoly, and they could fix their prices at about whatever they saw fit in submitting bids to comply with the specifications. These people protested against that. I take it this is the same proposition that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] referred to yesterday, when in his remarks he said:

I ventured to address a letter to the department asking if there could not be a correction of the specifications which should conform to the municipal building codes of the country and admit this material. The head of the department to which we are to commit the task of spending $60,000,000 had the effrontery in making reply to say to me, "I hope you will ask me to do nothing further in this matter."

I took this matter up with this organization upon the receipt of these telegrams and I suggested that it would be very unwise to get out specifications confining the sewer connections to one particular class of material; that from the Government's standpoint, as well as otherwise, it would be wise to leave it open and get the bids, and then take whatever was best. I received a letter the heading of which I have just read, and while it is not quite so discourteous as would appear to have been the reply to the Senator from Ohio it is a very peculiar letter, to say the least of it, to come from the head of a bureau of the Government in reply to those who have a right to inquire in reference to these matters. He says:

I have your favor of April 19. The vitrified-pipe interests are certainly on the job.

Then he goes on to say:

I have seen three or four of them, and have had numerous letters from various representatives of the Government, and I believe that I have satisfactorily met the views of the clay-pipe manufacturers in adjusting the standards.

Mr. THOMAS. Who is the author of that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is from Mr. Eidlitz.

Mr. THOMAS. Does it not also appear that the iron-pipe men are on the job?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They got their work in first—that is, they got it done, really. This letter does not give me any information that is definite to show what arrangement we had made, but he says he thinks he has made things satisfactory to these people. He says they are "on the job." He is certain the other people were on the job, and they seemed to have the ear of the director of this bureau the organization of which Congress has not authorized.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief comment on what my colleague [Mr. JONES of Washington] has said about a letter he received, similar to other letters that I have seen from this new army of officials who have come in as an incident of the war, men who are utterly inexperienced in public matters. The trouble with the letter and the state of mind which makes such letters as that possible is that these men are unable to distinguish properly between public and private business. That is the trouble with them. They are put into an office for the first time, and never having before felt the responsibility of dealing with the people's business they imagine that they can proceed along the same lines and with the same methods that they used in conducting their own private business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, $50,000,000 would furnish all the houses that are necessary to house the employees at these war plants. We might just as well tear the mask off this bill and show the motive back of it. This bureau, which has been created in the Department of Labor, a bureau of which Mr. Eidlitz is the head, has been created with the idea of building a whole lot of community centers for industrial workers throughout the country that are not needed in any way, but of course to win the war——

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator his authority for that statement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My authority for the statement is men who are connected with Mr. Eidlitz, the plans that are now being prepared, the numerous contractors who are down here, and representatives of the councils of various cities who are looking to——

Mr. SWANSON. Why did not the Senator have those witnesses summoned?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Because I did not know of it when the hearing was held before the committee.

Mr. SWANSON. Then have them brought here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have just heard of it. Does the Senator deny that that is the motive back of it?

Mr. SWANSON. I deny, as far as anyone appeared before the committee, that there was any such motive behind this bill. Here is a report from 15 or 18 places which was brought before the committee, which the Senator had every opportunity to read, showing where the plant was located and the necessity for housing the employees. I heard nothing about any such wild scheme as that. This matter was investigated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Senator is a member of the committee. He voted to report this bill. If he knew of these matters, I wish he had brought the attention of the committee to them. I would have summoned the committee to hear the parties.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I voted to report the bill in order that this appropriation of $50,000,000 as an emergency might be applied in the proper direction, to build houses at those plants, and $50,000,000 will more than build the houses needed for the employees at the plants. But I made the reservation that these houses should be built under the direction of the department having direct charge of those industries. The Senator will remember that, and that several other members of the committee at the same time made the same reservation. We did not believe it should be placed in this bureau with all its idealistic ideas.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator would put it in the hands of the President.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have just found out that the President has created this bureau and the whole policy is now illuminated. It shows what is behind this whole proposition, because I have had delegation after delegation from my State in my office asking me to intercede with this department in order that they might get a contract to erect buildings for these communities. If we are entering on a real estate proposition in this bill, let us know it. Let us hold up the bill and make some inquiry.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, here is a confidential report, and it states everything that is contemplated. He has been given an opportunity to examine it as to plants in his own State and elsewhere. It is confidential; it gives the number of houses needed, the number of people needed, the amount of contracts, and a full statement of the entire purpose. Here is the report submitted to the Senate committee. Does he doubt it? Did he read it?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I know as much about the war industries as those papers can tell me. I sat in the Military Committee four months and heard the evidence in regard to the need of housing facilities at these plants. I know they need them, and I am willing to vote for them, but I am not willing to vote for a great socialistic experiment to build a whole lot of houses that are not needed.

Mr. SWANSON. The bill limits it to navy yards, arsenals, and industrial plants engaged in war production. The Senator did not offer any other provision to it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senator knows I do not care to have a controversy with him. I only want to accomplish what the bill was intended to accomplish in this instance, and that is to provide the necessary housing facilities, but I want to point out to the Senator that we are going before the people of this country asking them to subscribe to liberty loans, we are taxing them to the utmost limit, and the Senate should be absolutely sure what the policy is behind the bill before they make any extended appropriation of money or create a policy which will cost us millions of dollars in the end and for which we shall have to tax the people or ask them to loan their money. Therefore I feel that we ought to know what is the motive behind this bill, and in view of statements which have come to me and to men in my State and in other States, that this is a policy to build up great community centers for industrial workers, we should be absolutely sure whether that is the policy in the bill or not.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I subscribe in the main to what the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has said. I have met Mr. Eidlitz, the gentleman referred to as the Director of the Building Commission of the Department of Labor. He is a business man of the city of New York. He is held in very high repute, and has had large experience in the construction of buildings in the city of New York. I am certain that he is in no wise involved in any undertaking here of profit to himself. But it is a fact, Mr. President, that in the Building Bureau, organized by the Department of Labor, he has surrounded himself with many of the social uplifters and tenement-house reformers of the country.

I have in my hand an article printed in last Friday's New York Sun which tells of the Shipping Board building a model town costing $3,000,000 at Camden, N. J. It is said that 907 houses are planned. It is proposed that workers may buy or rent these houses, and it is believed the houses will be ready in three months. Then it goes on and tells in detail what it is proposed to do.

> The town will be made as beautiful and as utilitarian as possible. Though it will be incorporated as a part of Camden, it will be known as Haddon Township. The houses, 907 in number, will be brick mostly and detached and laid off in rows. They will cost approximately $3,070 each.

> The city of Camden is ready to spend $325,000 in building schoolhouses, fire stations, sewage, and water plants. Extension of Camden trolley lines to Haddon Township will be undertaken by the Emergency Fleet Corporation at a cost of $125,000.

The town will be made as beautiful and as utilitarian as possible. It will be incorporated as a part of Camden, known as Haddon Township. The city of Camden is ready to spend $325,000 in building public schools, fire stations, sewage, and water pipes.

Mr. President, this is the second model township the Shipping Board has provided for that I know of—the one at Newport News and this one. I do not seriously object to the building of model, practical houses for the employees of the Government. My own judgment is that if a subject of this kind could be handled without too much attention being paid to the social side of things or the uplifting idea, perhaps we could construct these centers in the interest of the Government, and incidentally in the interest of the men employed in the Government plants.

I am convinced that the Government can not build frame barracks near navy yards and munition plants and induce men to leave other parts of the country, where they have attractive homes, to work in those plants if they are compelled to live in houses that are not attractive and comfortable. Skilled mechanics who are paid from $8 to $10 a day are not going to leave their place of abode in some pleasant city or town to work in Government plants under bad living conditions.

So, for my part, I am willing to erect permanent houses where it is practicable, provided, of course, every safeguard is taken to insure as near as possible the return of the Government money.

But I fear, as the Senator from New Jersey has just expressed it, that this is only a beginning. One of the gentlemen interested in this very work in talking to me recently intimated that this was only the beginning. I do not agree with the Senator from New Jersey that $50,000,000 will cover this work. I think that perhaps before a year is over we will be asked to contribute much more.

I would even go as far as to give $50,000,000 more if it should prove to be necessary, but, unless we are very careful, not only will $50,000,000 be asked, but $500,000,000 more.

So I am uncertain just what to do to safeguard the situation, because I know houses must be built and I know conditions must be met; but if this could be handled as a purely business proposition, and loans were made by the Government, under proper security, to the owners of munition plants, gun factories, and shipyards placing the responsibility upon them, I am sure better results would be obtained.

I can see no reason, Mr. President, why men who are making vast sums of money from Government work should not undertake some responsibility themselves for housing their own employees; and I am quite certain that if the thing was properly worked out we could dispose of this matter without the Government assuming the entire responsibility. But unless we are careful we are going to enter upon a stupendous scheme here, which in the end will cost the Government hundreds of millions of dollars, and the only result will be, as in the case of Camden and Newport News, the building of beautiful suburban villages all over the country to which the National Treasury will contribute very large amounts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. KING. In support of what the Senator is saying, I wish to state that I have received at least four letters from different parts of the United States, from individuals who are connected directly or indirectly with munitions and other industries furnishing supplies to the Government, urging me to support measures that will look to the appropriation of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars to build splendid houses for all who are engaged in work which conduces to the prosecution of the war. I have not any doubt in the world but what there is a propaganda now about to be inaugurated, if it is not already started, to induce the Government to furnish buildings for the employees of nearly every man who has any contract, directly or indirectly, with the Government.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator is correct. This measure is a departure from the custom of the country. Its only excuse is because we are at war, and I am afraid that some gentlemen outside of Congress interested in uplifting the human race have hit upon this method to work out some scheme of their own. It is a fact, however, that the whole country needs additional housing facilities.

When this bill came up the other day I took the trouble to communicate with the mayors of several of our larger cities. I find that in Boston in the year 1916, $38,350,000 worth of new buildings were constructed, and in the first three months of this year only $1,006,000 worth of buildings were constructed. On that basis it would mean that the building operations this year in Boston would be only 15 per cent of the total operations of 1916. In St. Louis, in 1916, the value of the buildings erected was $12,851,000.

On the basis of the first three months of this year the operations in St. Louis will not exceed $2,600,000, 20 per cent of those of 1916. In Philadelphia in 1916 the building operations totaled in value $47,000,000, and for this year they will probably not exceed $10,000,000. In Chicago in 1916 the building operations totaled $112,835,000, and this year they will not exceed $30,000,000. In the city of New York building operations totaled in 1916 the sum of $191,000,000, and this year they will not exceed $40,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from New York, who is competent to speak upon these matters, whether that is not due very largely to the tremendous increase in cost and scarcity of material and also of labor?

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Colorado is correct in the main, Mr. President. The material and labor going into building construction has increased in price about 50 per cent. I have analyzed the figures recently in New York City, when I was home last week, and I find that while the claim has been that the increased cost will be 100 per cent I think it is fair to say that it is somewhere between 40 and 50 per cent.

In connection with the figures I have just given, a careful estimate indicates that the building operations for 1916 in this country, outside of Government construction, were substantially $1,500,000,000, and that for this year they will not exceed $300,000,000—a falling off of 75 per cent. My information is that in every large city of the Nation there is a scarcity of housing facilities. In apartment houses, in tenement houses, in dwelling houses, there is 100 per cent occupancy, and while the conditions in New York are not quite so bad as they are in Washington they are very bad, indeed.

So, Mr. President, with that in mind, and realizing just what the Shipping Board has done in the matter of building these villages in the neighborhood of shipping plants, it seems to me that we are going to have, unless we are careful, tremendous building operations by the Government in the near future.

I offered an amendment to the War Finance Corporation bill when it was pending, which, if it had been agreed to, would have permitted, by offering proper security, the insurance companies and the mortgage companies of the country to come to the War Finance Corporation for aid. I said at the time that one of my reasons for offering that amendment was to enable corporations that ordinarily loan money in building operations to get relief if they needed it from the War Finance Corporation. The Senate, however, did not agree with my views in the matter. Therefore we lack relief in that direction.

The Senator from Colorado has referred to the increased cost of building materials. I might add to that, for the Senator's information, that in the city of New York to-day you can not get a building loan for new structures. There is some money to loan for permanent mortgages, but very little in comparison to what was obtainable a short time ago. The money formerly available for building operations is being used for the purchase of liberty bonds or is being held for the payment of the Government taxes due in June.

If I could write this measure or amend it properly, I would have it read that the department of the Government charged with the responsibility of this legislation, instead of itself building houses, should, under proper security, loan to responsible people the money with which to build. In that way we would encourage home building by private concerns; we would take care of the necessities of the country at this time, and, to a large degree, assure to the Nation the return of the investment made by the Government itself.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask some member of the committee if it has been determined to spend in the District of Columbia $10,000,000, which I see is proposed here, for building in this District? I understand a great number of employees are in the Food Administration Department and that a great number are in the Fuel Administration Department. I can not understand why the Food Administration Department should not be located in St. Louis and why the Fuel Administration Department should not be located in Chicago. I think these different departments might as well be located in other cities which are nearer the scene of the activities in the line of their control, where the offices and employees might easily be accommodated without the construction of new buildings. It seems to me that a great many of the other departments that are located here are not necessarily in direct touch with the heads of the departments and do not need to be located in Washington. If that is true, I do not see why they might not be sent to these other cities, where the Government would not be compelled to build houses to take care of the employees. I would like to know if any suggestion has been made to the committee negativing the idea that that could be done and demanding that these buildings must necessarily be erected here?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that a very accurate estimate was made as to what the departments expected relative to the increased number of employees in Washington. Each department was asked as to increased work and the number of employees that were expected and needed. The War Department estimated that it would need from May 1 to July 1, 4,928 additional employees; from July 1 to the 1st of December, 4,195 additional employees. The Labor Department estimated that it would need 80 additional employees from May 1 to July 1, and from July 1 to December 1 it would need 190. The Navy Department estimated that from May 1 to July 1 it would need 634 additional employees and from July 1 to December 31 it would need 740. All of the various departments were asked to furnish estimates, and the estimated total from May 1 to July 1 is 11,182 additional employees, and from July 1 to December 31, 11,598. They have made an estimate for the month of March, and the actual increase in needs exceeds the estimate that was made.

Some of these departments possibly might be decentralized—if I may use that expression—as Mr. Schwab took some of the Shipping Board clerks to Philadelphia.

Mr. KIRBY. Does the Senator's report show what the forces in the Fuel Control Department and the Food Administration are?

Mr. SWANSON. The Fuel Administration expects to have 160 additional clerks from May 1 to July 1, and 240 additional clerks, I think it is, from July 1 to December 31.

Mr. KIRBY. How many have they now? That is what I am trying to ascertain?

Mr. SWANSON. I have not an estimate as to how many they now have.

Mr. KIRBY. It would seem to me that most of these matters might be taken care of by putting employees in other cities, where they could be accommodated without going to the trouble of building houses. They would not be far enough away to cause any inconvenience in the finishing up of the work.

Mr. SWANSON. In addition to that we have the large works in connection with the Navy and the making of our large guns in the gun factory in Washington, and a large increase in that part of the money which is appropriated for the District of Columbia will be used for housing persons who are needed in the Washington Gun Factory or Navy Yard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Virginia if he has made any inquiry or estimate as to the amount of money which has already been expended by the Government in the District of Columbia in the matter of building houses?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think the Government has spent any money in that way. I do not know whether it would have authority to expend any money unless there was a special appropriation for that purpose, and I am not aware of any such.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes; we made an appropriation, I think, of $2,000,000 last year for the construction of a building on Sixth Street. I think I am not mistaken about that.

Mr. SWANSON. For housing?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I mean buildings of all kinds.

Mr. SWANSON. The only appropriation that has been made in recent years was for the building opposite the Treasury Department, next to the Belasco Theater, which they are now building. As to rentals, that question does not come to our committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. What interests me is, that when I came here last October and drove about the city I was inclined to throw up my hands and say that the work that I had tried to do for 25 years to make Washington the most beautiful city in the world—that was the stereotyped phrase—had been pretty much thrown away. We have constructed shacks—some of them are almost shacks—all over our parks in the District of Columbia. We have ruined our parks; we have ruthlessly cut down trees that have required 75 years to grow; and we are continuing that work. We have now invaded Potomac Park; we have taken East Seaton and West Seaton Parks; we have taken that strip of land known as Henry Park; and we are going on with that kind of work.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say to the Senator that I am not acquainted with the details of it; it did not come from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; it came, I think, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which the Senator is a member, and probably he has as full information as I have in regard to the matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. The appropriation was made by the Appropriations Committee, but what I desire to know is, who determines where these buildings shall be erected? I know enough about the District of Columbia to know that the Government might have gone out a mile or so and acquired land that would not have done injury to the District of Columbia, so far as its beauty is concerned, upon which all of these buildings, or most of them, could have been erected; and if it had been necessary to build structures for movies we might have done that also to accommodate those who are going to occupy those buildings; but it seems that somebody has gone along in the District of Columbia, absolutely without regard to the beauty of the city, has destroyed the parks and has destroyed the appearance of the city, so far as its beauty is concerned, without any regard to results. That is the way it strikes me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am very anxious to ask the Senator who authorized this horrible performance?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know; I know that an appropriation was made last year when I was absent on account of illness.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was not any necessity for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. An appropriation was made of something over $2,000,000, and I think the site for that building was described—I refer to the building on Sixth Street NW., running back to the Fish Commission Building.

Mr. SMOOT. That cost over $6,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Utah says it cost over $6,000,000. Magnificent trees were cut down in that park, the value of which could not be estimated to this District. So the work has gone on. "Woodman, spare that tree" has been forgotten; our great effort to beautify Washington, to have wide streets, beautiful avenues, and lovely parks has been lost sight of absolutely; and I do not know under whose authority it was done, although, of course, the appropriations were made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. There have been appropriations made for some of these buildings; but I want to say to the Senator that there have been buildings erected and paid for from the fund of $100,000,000 which we granted to the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no question about that.

Mr. SMOOT. There has been expended in one case about $6,000,000, in another case $2,000,000, and altogether about $12,000,000 which the Appropriations Committee have recommended for the erection of these temporary structures. I will ask the Senator from Virginia if that is not correct?

Mr. MARTIN. I would not undertake to give the figures accurately, but substantially that is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. That amount is substantially correct at any rate. Then, I will say to the Senator, I do not know how much has been taken out of the President's fund for the purpose of erecting different buildings.

Mr. GALLINGER. A little while ago I noticed that the House of Representatives had refused to appropriate something over $4,000,000 for the building on the old Arlington Hotel site.

Mr. SMOOT. The House did not refuse, but the Senate refused to put it in the bill, and the Senator will remember that then immediately the amount necessary was taken out of the President's fund.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator correctly states the fact. The Senate refused to make that appropriation of over $4,000,000 for the building on the old Arlington site; but those who were constructing that building reached out and got that $4,000,000, and I presume they made a fair profit on it; I do not know how much. So we are going along.

I am perhaps not more concerned than any other Senator about the District of Columbia, but I was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia for 22 years; I was chairman of the committee for 10 years; and I gave the best efforts of my life, neglecting interests of my own constituents, to build up the city of Washington along correct lines. We made wonderful progress, so much so that many times it was stated by visitors from foreign nations that we had or were going to have the most beautiful city in the world. But I do not know what is going to happen to Washington unless we stop the process that has been going on here and seems to be continuing at a rapid rate at the present time. If there was any way to stop it, to halt the vandalism, as I am inclined to call it, that is being perpetrated in this city, I should like to see it done; but perhaps it is too late to talk about it now.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he believes there will be a permanent injury by the erection of these temporary buildings on the public lands and parks of Washington?

Mr. GALLINGER. There certainly is a temporary injury, if not a permanent injury, and I do not know why there will not be a permanent injury.

Mr. PHELAN. Of course, we all deplore it. I do not know what authority has been granted, but in conversation with some members of the Fine Arts Commission I learned that they had advised that the buildings be as ugly as possible in order to compel their demolition at the end of the war.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is about the best thing I have known the Fine Arts Commission to do for a good many years. If they have succeeded in doing that, they have succeeded in doing a good thing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want the RECORD to carry the statement of my thorough conviction that they have succeeded.

Mr. PHELAN. There is no intention—I wish to make the point—of maintaining those buildings as a permanent adornment to the city. I think we are all of one mind that they should be destroyed at the conclusion of the war.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the buildings that have been erected by authority of Congress are for the most part temporary buildings that may be used for two or three years. They to some extent impair the beauty of the city. They have been authorized by Congress, notwithstanding that fact and with full knowledge of that fact, because they were war-emergency buildings. I am sure Congress does not want even the beauty of Washington to stand in the way of the successful conduct of this war.

There has been no building erected by authority of the Congress that will be any permanent disfigurement to the city; but they were erected where they were urgently needed for emergency war purposes, and I am sure there is not a Member of the Senate who would not approve of every one of them if he was familiar with the facts. They have been authorized deliberately, advisedly, and solely for emergency buildings of a temporary character in most instances.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will permit me, I want heartily to indorse what he has said. I think that we could not have done better, and it is well that the buildings are of a character that makes it plain that they are to be only temporary.

I might say, if the Senator will permit me further, that I went through some of these buildings recently and urged that every precaution should be taken to avoid loss by fire.

Mr. PHELAN. Does the Senator mean loss of life?

Mr. CALDER. I refer especially to damage by fire to the buildings and to the property of the Government, and I am glad to say that some fire apparatus has been installed in those buildings. That was a very wise precaution, because the buildings in the main are constructed of inflammable material; but that could not have been otherwise, as they were designed to be temporary in character and the necessity for speed in their construction was great.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, these buildings have usually been erected at places convenient to the work to be done. Of course, we could have gone outside the limits of the city or we could have gone to remote locations in the city, but those locations would not have answered the urgent necessities of the war conditions. I am sure every precaution, every care has been taken which could be taken consistently with the object in view. There have been, of course, some buildings erected here out of the emergency fund which was placed in the hands of the President, and otherwise, that the committees of Congress did not deal with; but, so far as the Committee on Appropriations has dealt with these matters—and they have dealt with most of them and there has been congressional action—the committee has used every precaution to prevent any injury to the beauty of the city, and in the long run no injury will be done. An urgent war necessity has been met with as little injury to the beauty of the city as was possible.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator says that no buildings of a permanent character have been authorized by Congress.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator is mistaken. I said for the most part they were temporary. Some permanent buildings have been authorized.

Mr. McCUMBER. Has there been any authority from Congress to erect permanent buildings?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know.

Mr. McCUMBER. And if not, where was the authority obtained?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know to what extent the permanent buildings may have been put up. I do know that the building being erected on the old Arlington Hotel site, which is designed to be permanent and very handsome and commodious, has been authorized and paid for out of the emergency fund granted to the President. Four million two hundred thousand dollars have been dedicated to the purchase of that site and for the completion of the building out of the emergency fund granted to the President. Congress did not act in that matter at all. There were measures pending for that purpose, but pending action the President set aside $4,200,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. Has the Senator any information as to whether the price paid for that building was an exorbitant price?

Mr. MARTIN. My information is that the price is not an exorbitant one. It will be a very fine building, thoroughly fireproof, with a handsome exterior and an interior conveniently arranged for departmental purposes. I believe the Government will receive a dollar's worth for every dollar it pays out in that transaction. That is the information which I have; indeed, I think that the contractors put at the disposal of the Treasury Department every book and every paper they had showing what money had been expended. The amount may have been a little liberal. I, of course, do not pretend to speak with the utmost detail, but, generally speaking, I believe it was a very carefully made bargain and that the Government will get a dollar's worth for every dollar it pays out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Carefully made, of course, as compared with some of the other expenditures which have been made?

Mr. MARTIN. I think the matter was carefully investigated. I will say that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and some other Government officials talked with me about it when action was contemplated by the Appropriations Committee, but the Appropriations Committee did not act on it, and the purchase price was paid out of the emergency fund voted to the President.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to know why the Government does not utilize and put up buildings on the ground which was acquired several years ago. As the Senator knows, we acquired several squares east of the District Building and south of Pennsylvania Avenue. I think there are three or four blocks there altogether, but instead of using that property the Government buys other property and puts up buildings, leaving all that property dead and idle.

Mr. MARTIN. The Government has bought very little real estate, and the buildings which it has erected have been erected on its own property. On the property to which the Senator refers on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue there are already valuable buildings, and to some extent those buildings are being used for Government purposes. On investigation it was thought inadvisable at this time to tear down those buildings for the purpose of erecting other buildings when the Government had land on which it could erect the buildings which it needs. I repeat, some of the buildings on the property referred to by the Senator from Minnesota are already being used.

Mr. NELSON. How many squares has the Government there?

Mr. MARTIN. I can not speak with entire accuracy as to the number of squares.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is only one, extending from Fifteenth Street to Fourteenth Street on the south side of and facing the Avenue.

Mr. NELSON. My impression is that the Government owns four or five squares there.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator from Utah probably knows as to that. The Government owns a good many buildings there, some of which are in use; and it was deemed, after investigation, unwise to tear those buildings down for the purpose of erecting new buildings when the Government had other land on which the buildings might be erected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Minnesota that I thought the Senator had reference to the lots that face Pennsylvania Avenue; and I said that there was one square facing Pennsylvania Avenue. It is true that the Government acquired the property to B Street, embracing three squares between Pennsylvania Avenue and B Street, but there is only one block facing Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mr. NELSON. That is all facing the Avenue; but the blocks back of Pennsylvania Avenue are covered with a lot of rookeries which might well be torn down.

Mr. SMOOT. And the city would be very much better off without a good many of them, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. They might very well be torn down, and the land utilized for the Government, instead of buying at such an exorbitant figure the old Arlington property.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in relation to the Arlington property, I will say that I was convinced that the Senate should not without some investigation appropriate the amount asked for to purchase that property. After the Senate decided not to make the appropriation several people came to me and told me that the price agreed upon for the property was an outrageous one; that the Government was being held up; and that the price paid was entirely unreasonable. I told them that I did not propose to ask for any investigation unless they would place in my hands affidavits showing what the property cost and wherein the price was exorbitant and unreasonable; but that, if they would furnish me such affidavits, then, based upon those affidavits, I would introduce a resolution of inquiry providing for an investigation of the matter. I will say that up to this time I have not received those affidavits, and therefore I shall not say anything more about that property at this time, nor will I do anything about it unless I am furnished some affidavits upon which to base a resolution.

Mr. PHELAN. Let me ask the Senator if there was not some kind of a showing made before the House as to the price which should be paid for that property?

Mr. SMOOT. There was a statement made before the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate; but that was based upon the number of square feet that would be in the building, the amount of rental that the Government is compelled to pay to-day for each square foot of space, and the interest upon that charge for rent; which, altogether, would bring the amount for the building up to about $4,000,000; but that figure is based, as I have said, upon the rentals that are being paid to-day in that part of the city. I have not any doubt that $4,200,000 will more than cover the cost of the building and the ground, too.

Mr. PHELAN. We know the value of the land, as a matter of public information. Has there been any estimate made as to the cost of the building?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; there is an estimate as to the cost of the building.

Mr. PHELAN. Would that, plus the value of the land, aggregate $4,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the way it was figured out, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. I am not referring to profits, but to actual cost.

Mr. SMOOT. It was figured upon the basis of rents to-day in that locality, and what the total of rent would be if the building were used five years only. On that basis it was shown by the Treasury Department—that is, by the architects of the Supervising Architect's Office of that department—that the expenditure of $4,000,000 for the purchase of that property would be justified.

Mr. PHELAN. I have no information whatever on the subject; I am seeking for information. If the price is exorbitant I should like to know it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have said all I can say about that.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, answering one inquiry of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], I think the value of the land with the excavation—and the excavation is for two stories below the surface—was placed at a million dollars. I think that was a very fair valuation, because that is one of the finest sites and largest lots in the city of Washington. The Government paid half a million dollars, if I am not mistaken, for the lot adjacent to the Riggs National Bank.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was the price for the entire Arlington site $1,000,000?

Mr. MARTIN. One million dollars, including the excavation, a very expensive excavation, going two stories below the surface.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, is it not true that it was foreclosed for a mortgage of about $400,000 because they could not get a purchaser who would take the mortgage?

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, no. The question answers itself. Anybody who knows anything about Washington knows that there never would have been any trouble at any time in the last 20 years in getting more than $400,000 in five minutes for the Arlington Hotel site.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it not true that that particular property was sold a few years ago under a mortgage and the title bought by foreclosure of a mortgage or trust deed?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know about that; but I know there has not been a time since I have been in the city of Washington, some twenty-odd years, when it would not have commanded a great deal more than any $400,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. That does not answer my question. I think it was about $400,000. I remember reading it at the time.

Mr. MARTIN. There may have been a mortgage of $400,000, and it may have been sold under that mortgage; but it has never been valued at any such price as that—never.

Mr. McCUMBER. I knew that there had been several attempts to sell it, and all of them had fallen down, and then it was put in the hands of a receiver.

Mr. MARTIN. There never has been any attempt to sell it at $400,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will find that my statements are substantially correct if he will look over the records of the last few years.

Mr. MARTIN. It does not need any statement from anybody. I know enough about Washington property to know of my own knowledge that it is worth a great deal more than any $400,000, and it has been readily salable at a great deal more than that at any time within 20 years. It is one of the most valuable and one of the largest building sites in the city of Washington. I have not undertaken to make any exhaustive inquiry into it, although I have had a good deal said to me about it, and I think the Treasury Department made a careful investigation of the subject. I am satisfied, so far as my own personal opinion is concerned, that the Government got full value when it paid $4,200,000 for the property—that is, for the lot and for the building that is to be put on it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had no purpose, in what I said, of criticizing the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me, I understand that the Committee on Appropriations never acted upon it. I am not speaking for the committee. The Committee on Appropriations never took any action on the Arlington Hotel site.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand so; but I meant in a general way in the observations I made about the city of Washington.

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, I was sure of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know that the Senator from Virginia is very careful in scanning the appropriations, and I know that the Senator from Virginia agrees with me that we ought to be as economical as possible in spending the people's money; but I will venture to say that I wish the Senator from Virginia had had the same power that he has over the appropriations to have determined how many clerks were needed in the city of Washington because of the war. I believe that more than twice the number that are necessary have been brought here. That is my individual belief; and yet they propose to bring thousands and thousands more here. They are tumbling over each other—clerks who, to a large extent, are incompetent, without any ability at all to do good work. I have knowledge of that myself in a great many instances, and I think we have been compelled to construct a great many more buildings than would have been necessary had there been some system in the hands of competent men under which we could have ascertained definitely how much clerical help and other help was needed in the work consequent upon the war. That, however, is a mere opinion of mine, and it goes for what it is worth.

I think the habit is that when the head of a department or the head of a bureau or the head of a division says: "I want 50 clerks" or "I want 100 clerks," they are forthcoming from some quarter or other. Why, I read a little while ago, and I think it was not a misrepresentation, that a gentleman in one of the departments said that he could use 1,200 stenographers if he could get them. He said it was impossible to get them, but he could make use of 1,200 stenographers if he could get them; and I presume they raked the country over and got all they could. I really feel, laying aside the question of appropriations for the construction of buildings, that there has been a wanton recklessness in the matter of adding to the force of clerks and other officials in the departments consequent upon the war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the 1,200 stenographers were needed by the Aviation Section?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know. I think perhaps they were as much needed there as they were in some other departments of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. If so, that might account for some of the $640,000,000 that we have appropriated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 9, after the word "Provided," it is proposed to strike out the word "further."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, now that we have adopted the first proviso, the word "further" ought to remain in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be rejected.

The SECRETARY. On lines 14 and 15, page 2, after the word "exercised," it is proposed to strike out the words "in the housing of Government employees," so as to read:

Provided further, That the powers herein authorized shall not be exercised in the District of Columbia except upon detailed estimates and appropriations for such purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether he thinks that is a wise proviso?

Mr. SWANSON. With regard to the District of Columbia?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes. I heartily indorse the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] a while ago with reference to the conditions here in the District of Columbia.

It seems to me that we have housing necessities here that are about as urgent as those anywhere in the country, if not more so, and that expeditious work should be done to secure housing facilities for the employees here. It seems to me that this proviso would result in very great delay. I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what he thinks about it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this provision was not included in the bill as reported by the committee to the House. This provision, as I understand, was put in the bill on the floor of the House of Representatives on motion of the Representative from Kentucky who is the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Under this provision the bill is not operative in the District of Columbia until estimates are made and until Congress authorizes specific appropriations. It will evidently result in a great deal of delay.

In discussing it with the committee and also with other Members of the Senate a great many Members of the Senate had an idea that they did not know what would occur in the District. People were apprehensive of their houses being seized, and it was feared that there might be a reckless expenditure of money. In order to get the bill reported and through, and to save a great deal of time, it was thought better not to interfere with that. I have an idea that this provision will result in great delay; but as Congress is in session here, and the people that are to administer the law are near Congress and can fix up these detailed statements quickly, and report to the Committee on Appropriations, and they can act hurriedly, we thought possibly it might be well to retain that provision for the District of Columbia. Of course, in the case of buildings outside of the District of Columbia, to come to Washington and lay detailed estimates for appropriations before Congress would be absolutely destructive of the purposes sought to be accomplished by the bill.

I think if Congress were willing to leave it to these people to contract, in view of the fact that the President is authorized to expend $10,000,000 in the District of Columbia, we would get the buildings a great deal quicker. It is for Congress to determine whether they want it operative here or whether they want to wait until Congress makes the appropriation before it becomes operative. Under the rules the Appropriations Committee can not report an appropriation for a building unless it is authorized by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. We can not appropriate; we can only authorize; and this authorization was made in pursuance of the rules of the Senate and the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but the committee could have eliminated that proviso and allowed the work to go on here just the same as in other sections of the country.

Mr. SWANSON. I am willing to leave it to the President to spend this $10,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am, too; but I think that proviso ought to be stricken out. I offer that amendment, Mr. President—to strike out that proviso.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington should be adopted, because the proviso as it now stands would make inoperative that part of section 8 which appropriates $10,000,000 for District of Columbia purposes, and, moreover, would, as the Senator having charge of the bill admits, very seriously retard the operation of the bill, which is supposed to be one of great emergency. Indeed, the Senator having charge of the bill has on several occasions insisted that we should enact this measure into legislation as soon as possible, because it is one of the most emergent bills before the Congress.

Now, let us look at the proviso for a moment:

Provided further, That the powers herein authorized shall not be exercised in the housing of Government employees in the District of Columbia except upon detailed estimates and appropriations for such purpose.

Let me say in passing that the House evidently sought to limit "the powers herein authorized" to the housing of Government employees, leaving the remainder of the bill as active in the District of Columbia as beyond its boundaries. But with the elimination of the words "in the housing of Government employees," none of the powers authorized by this bill can be exercised in the District of Columbia at all until detailed estimates and appropriations for such purpose both occur.

The bill makes an appropriation of $10,000,000 for District of Columbia purposes. This proviso renders that appropriation practically of no effect, because the powers are not to be exercised except upon detailed estimates and appropriations upon those detailed estimates.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator feel that that was deemed necessary because the committee, or those who were responsible for that particular feature of the bill, were not quite satisfied of the necessity of erecting buildings within the District of Columbia? I will say, speaking for myself, that I do not think there is any necessity, and I would very much prefer to leave the bill as it is rather than to strike out the provision, as suggested by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, Mr. President, if there is no necessity for the erection of houses here, I can very readily understand why the proviso was inserted; but if I am any judge of housing conditions, there is a greater need for the building of houses in the District of Columbia than anywhere else in the United States. This is the most congested community in the United States, as I had occasion to say in the discussion of a previous amendment.

Why, Mr. President, I do not know how others in this body are situated with regard to housing possibilities, but I am unable to lease anything myself at the present time for the ensuing winter. I can find nothing that is vacant, and my landlord has absolutely declined to extend my present lease under any conditions. I assume that he is going to cut up the house into rooms, furnish them, and then rent them for $100 a month apiece. I do not know, but I know that is being done very largely in this city. I know of two apartment houses the tenants now occupying which are expected to get out as soon as their leases expire, and then the houses are going to be practically reconstructed, the apartments are going to be thrown into rooms, and those rooms which are now used for culinary purposes in connection with the apartments are going to be turned into bedrooms, then they are going to be furnished, and the proposition, as I understand it, is to rent the rooms at a per diem rate, bringing in a revenue which in some instances will perhaps—I hope, at least—exhaust cupidity.

Mr. President, we have in the city of Washington an enormous congestion. It is here, and its limitations have not been reached. "They are coming, Father Abraham," several hundred thousand strong. They are coming from all the points of the compass. There is not a Member of Congress who is not besieged with applications for official positions in the city of Washington, and there is not a man or a woman writing for these positions who does not believe that his or her Senator or Member of Congress has the positions, and can dole them out at will, if application is made in due season. We have been advised that some twelve or fifteen hundred additional employees are coming. They must have them—I do not know why, but they must have them—and, of course, the floating population of the city, as far as I am able to judge, is also increasing.

A hotel was opened down here about two weeks ago. It is only partly completed internally, and yet every room that is available was instantly taken, and taken at the landlord's prices.

Mr. President, if our population is to increase very materially—as is doubtless the case—this is the place of all places where the power to take houses ought to be exercised, and where the building of houses should begin just as soon as possible. Hence to exempt the District of Columbia from the operation of this bill until estimates and appropriations for that purpose shall have been made is to defeat its operation in the very place where it is most needed.

I think, therefore, that this proviso should be eliminated, and I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The entire proviso is out, now, down to the word "purpose," in line 17, page 4. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the words "local transportation" and the comma after the word "transportation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what sort of buildings it is proposed to construct in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SWANSON. The details are not as accurate here as elsewhere, although they have made a survey; but the matter is under Capt. Potter, and they expect to put up, I think, some temporary buildings, possibly hotels and apartment houses, adapted as well as possible to the situation. I have not seen any detailed statement as to the kind or character of buildings that they propose to put up in Washington.

Mr. CALDER. I had hoped, Mr. President, that in utilizing this money we might construct here buildings something like the Young Women's Christian Association dormitories, where a number of rooms could be contained in one building, and where decent living conditions might exist.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know, but I do not understand that they have gotten any detailed statement as to what they expect to construct in Washington.

Mr. CALDER. I should oppose very strongly the building of frame barracks, where there might be great risk of loss of life by fire. I would have buildings constructed that would comply with all the building regulations, and that would be attractive, and would be permanent, and where moderate rents could be had in the future.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. If that policy were carried out, the Senator must know that $50,000,000 would be just a fleabite in comparison to what would be ultimately expended. In other words, if that policy is to be carried out, we had better make it $500,000,000.

Mr. CALDER. I would not dream of doing that, Mr. President, in the District of Columbia. We have a city here that undoubtedly will need permanent structures, and we ought to have something attractive about it, something worth while. I hope some such method will be pursued here, at any rate.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee is on page 5, line 11——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in line 22, of page 4, the words "local transportation" were stricken out a moment ago. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether it was not intended to strike out also the words "and other community facilities"?

Mr. SWANSON. Wherever the words "local transportation and other community facilities" appear in the bill they should be eliminated. I hope the Secretary will make those amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was not done a moment ago.

The SECRETARY. On line 22, page 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "and other community facilities."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "local transportation, and other community facilities."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the bill as reported by the committee only strikes out the words "local transportation." Was the omission of the other words an oversight?

Mr. SWANSON. It was an oversight in the print.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am not going to object to that, but I want to say that my study of this question of the need of housing shows that it is largely a transportation question. It is more largely a transportation question than it is a housing question. The difficulty about taking care of workers in the various Government works of the country is that they are obliged to live so far away from the works. If the Government had the power to command control of the transportation facilities they would have to build far fewer houses. If you could control the transportation facilities, you would solve the housing proposition in nine cases out of ten; and I think myself it is a mistake to strike that out of the bill. You would save a great deal of money by retaining it. You would not have to buy the transportation lines, but you could regulate and control and perhaps increase the transportation facilities to some extent, and people could live some distance away, 2 or 3 miles away from where they had to work, if they could come in in 15 or 20 minutes by means of properly regulated transportation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that, I suppose, would mean that the Government could go into the building of electric car lines.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I would not say they would have to build them. I will say to the Senator that I am quite sure that existing facilities would in a good many instances serve the purpose; but the trouble is that they do not cooperate. There is a disposition not to meet the needs by putting on proper schedules, and perhaps adding some cars.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is wrong about that. The Public Utilities Commission and the expert who is now trying to handle the street-car facilities in the District of Columbia have exhausted all their skill and energy to better the present congestion. A man almost takes his life in his hands to go on these street cars now.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not doubt that in the least. I think in the District of Columbia that is quite true; but there are places in the country, not here in the District, where there are transportation facilities now, but they are not properly utilized, and by improving them a little the housing question could be very largely settled.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps, too, the Senator from Florida has overlooked the fact that the people who are coming here not only mildly but vehemently protest against going into rural communities. They propose to live in Washington, near the theaters and the "movies" and that sort of thing.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, I do not think the Government ought to accommodate those people. I do not believe we have any business to go to work building houses here in Washington to take care of people who want to frolic.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is more familiar with conditions here than I am. Is it not a fact, in his judgment, that unless the local transportation facilities are improved it will be necessary, in order to house all these people, to dispossess the actual residents of Washington of the houses which they now own and occupy? If you are going to house 30,000 people here where they can be accessible to the places where they work, will it not, in the opinion of the Senator from his knowledge of the conditions here, be necessary to dispossess actual residents of the houses which they now have, unless you do improve the local transportation facilities so that they can be taken outside of the present congested centers?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the tendency will be that way very largely.

Mr. FALL. That is the impression I have had on that line.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the Senator will recall, perhaps, that we had some such bill reported from the Committee on Commerce, and that the Senator from Florida refrained from pressing the consideration of that bill because I wished to make some investigation of the subject; and finally, after a complete investigation, I was convinced that the Senator's bill was an emergency one, and it passed; and a bill accomplishing this very purpose for the Shipping Board, under such language as is contained in this bill, has passed both Houses of Congress, and is now on the statute books.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Florida and I agreed that it was a very important matter, to avoid a large expenditure of money in building, to be able to extend railway facilities so as to accommodate the people otherwise.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is correct about that. That was our conclusion at the time.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 14, after the word "occupied," it is proposed to insert "occupant being given 10 days' notice in which to vacate," so as to read:

Immediate possession thereof may be taken to the extent of the interest to be acquired and the same may be occupied, occupant being given 10 days' notice in which to vacate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that he put the words in italics in parentheses. I think he will see that it reads much more smoothly in that way.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that being done.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to put parentheses around the words in italics.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 7——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, on page 6 I should like to substitute the word "President" for the words "Secretary of Labor," and wherever else they occur in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that that has been done.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN and Mr. FALL addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, before section 7 is reached I wish to offer an amendment to section 6, which I ask the Secretary to state.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, section 5 has not been passed over as yet, and I have an amendment to that section which I wish to offer when the proper time comes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are on section 5 now.

Mr. FALL. I was not recognized, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is recognized now.

Mr. FALL. I have an amendment to section 5, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, at the top of the page, it is proposed to amend section 5 by striking out all after the word "authority" in line 3 down to the word "to" in line 4—to strike out the following words: "To care for and rent such property as remains undisposed of and," so that, if amended, it will read:

SEC. 5. That the power and authority granted herein shall cease with the termination of the present war, except the power and authority to conclude and execute contracts for the sale of property made during the war.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course the amendment speaks for itself. I very seriously object at this time and through the provisions of a measure which does not provide specific purposes or special appropriations or estimates for the carrying out of its purposes to fastening upon this country as a permanent policy permanent national ownership, control, and renting of houses—in other words, the real estate business.

I realize the great necessity for providing houses now, and of course those houses becoming the property of the Government must be disposed of in some way; but the limitation upon this bill is provided in this section. That limitation itself is removed in so far as the care and the renting of the houses acquired under the provisions of the bill is concerned.

Mr. President, we have pending before Congress at this time a bill for the improvement of the rivers and harbors, a great national asset of the country, and the improvement of which, in my judgment, is, in proper hands, just as necessary for war purposes as any other we may be confronted with. The total appropriation carried in that bill is something like $19,000,000—less than $20,000,000—and every year when the great river and harbor bill comes before the Congress of the United States, in practically every newspaper in the country, weekly and daily, in the great cities from New York to New Mexico, the Congress of the United States is criticized for the pork-barrel appropriations involved in specific appropriations made upon estimates for the different purposes designated, beyond which no authority can go. The same thing is true of the public building bills generally, only one of which I think has been passed here in the last five or six years, so far as my memory serves me, carrying an appropriation of some $25,000,000 for public buildings all over the United States, each of those estimated for, each to be built under the restrictions provided by Congress itself; and yet, as I said, upon every occasion Congress, in dealing with matters of this kind, even when it may make the specific appropriation and throw around all the safeguards which it is possible to provide to insure the proper expenditure of the taxpayers' money, is invariably criticized and we are called logrollers and accused of dipping into the pork barrel.

We have recently passed a bill with no restrictions, the money to be expended upon no estimates, with no particular provision whatsoever contained in it, with no safeguards of any kind or character thrown around it, by which $50,000,000 of the people's money is to be expended for housing by the Shipping Board. It was said that it was a war necessity and we adopted it. This bill is claimed now to be a war necessity. It carries an appropriation of $60,000,000. It carries the authority which has never been vested in any man's hands before in the history of this country. It carries the right to expend the $60,000,000 without accounting to anyone whomsoever, except that a report shall be made from time to time to the Congress of the United States. It carries with it a provision that the $60,000,000 can be loaned without responsibility whatsoever, except as placed in this amendment, that it must be upon security of some kind.

Never in the history of the country, Mr. President, under the plea of war necessity or upon any other plea, has there been such legislation proposed and adopted as we have recently adopted in this body.

Mr. President, I am as firmly convinced of what I shall say now as I am that I am addressing the Senate of the United States. I believe, sir, in my heart that there is to-day an insidious, concerted effort being carried on under the plea of war necessity to socialize this Government of ours, to overturn the entire Government of the United States.

I believe that the provision to which I am now speaking and which I am proposing to strike out of this bill is an insidious effort, is a creature of very great intellect, I may say, intended to fasten as a permanent policy upon this Nation Government ownership, not of transportation lines or of public utilities, but that it is the determined effort of certain people in this country to bring about not only State socialism in those lines but actual State socialism to the very extremest degree; in other words, Government ownership of all the properties in common, not only of the instrumentalities of production, but that the Government itself shall hold the lives and the happiness and the safety of the people at the mercy of a Government employee.

Mr. President, only once before in the history of this hemisphere has there ever been anything like the conditions which will exist, in my judgment, should we perpetuate the legislation which we are now called upon to adopt as a matter of war necessity. If we read back to the history of Peru as it was discovered by the Spaniards in 1500, you will there find that there was a governing class and a working class. They had Government ownership—socialism rampant and magnificently carried out—in Peru, under what is known as the Incas civilization. The Incas were nothing but the officeholders, and the other inhabitants of Peru worked for them and were allowed a portion of the product of their toil.

I say to you, Mr. President, that socialism in a democracy such as ours means the downfall of the democracy, because it means the tyranny of the mob. We have gone to Government ownership of the railroads to-day, and the best I hope to see as a result from the conditions we have created will be possibly a revolution among the people, bringing about private operation rather than Government operation of the railroads. If we continue to operate the railroads under the theory advanced by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is Director General of Railroads, in his speech at El Paso, Tex., a few days since, then we are confronted with this condition, that in every election hereafter, held every two years in the United States, the great issue will be whether a man shall receive 10 hours' pay for 7 hours' work, or a man's wages shall be increased, and the election of Representatives and Senators and of the President of the United States will turn upon those questions. When you involve Government ownership in a democracy, with frequent periods of election, when you involve it as you are now involving it in every piece of legislation which we are adopting, sooner or later this Government of ours and our forefathers is going to be overturned, just so surely as the sun rises in the east and sets in the west.

Now, sir, under the plea of necessity, under the plea that we must save this country in its great crisis, we are asked to adopt this measure providing exactly what I suggested to the Senator from Florida a few moments ago, that if the people who are claimed to be necessary on departmental work are to be housed in Washington it is going to be necessary to deprive an equal number of citizens of Washington of their homes, drive them away from the city, even as suggested by one of the Senators here that the people now in Washington who are not actually engaged in Government work should be invited to quit their homes and go somewhere else.

Mr. President, just look where we are going. I will go just as far as any of you in attempting to do what I can do consistently to win this war and to yield some measure of my convictions to those who are charged with the responsibility of carrying on the war and of conducting the administration at this time. I have voted for measures which I would never have believed I would have presented to me to vote for. I have gone further than many of my colleagues upon this side; I am going to the very utmost limit; but I can not refrain from uttering now my warning to the Senators here in the United States Senate that we are verging upon socialism, and we have gone to it under the plea of war necessity. How are we going to get away from it is another proposition. I believe that we will do it. It may be brought about by bloody revolution in this country of ours to-day such as is soaking the soil of Russia with blood. We all pray not, and I hope not. I never believed that this Government which our forefathers founded would be torn down as other governments have been torn down. I never believed it would meet the fate of all other democracies which traveling their cycles have disappeared from the face of the earth. One of the reasons why I never believed that was the reason assigned by every writer and commentator upon our Constitution, not only upon the theory of the three checks and balances, by a division of power in the Government, but that this Government could be perpetuated because as a supreme check upon the power of centralized government here was the sovereignty of 48 States as they exist now. This bill does away with your State sovereignty. One of the most insidious wounds which has ever been dealt to State sovereignty is being dealt now. Every day you are doing away with State's rights. Senators present here, those who have a few more years to serve than I have, may yet in their service represent simply an imaginary State line corresponding to the county lines in the States themselves.

Mr. President, let us pause for one moment. Let us check this mad rush in which we are engaged. Let us strike out this provision perpetuating forever Government ownership and control, and the right to rent and handle these houses which we are providing shall now become Government property because of a war necessity. But instead of providing that the effect of this bill shall cease with the expiration of the war it is specifically excepted by the provision in section 5. There is a specific exception continuing the care and rental of these houses for the purposes for which we are now acquiring them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator if he will not read into the RECORD the provision to which he alludes?

Mr. FALL. I will:

SEC. 5. That the power and authority granted herein shall cease with the termination of the present war, except the power and authority to care for and rent such property as remains undisposed of and to conclude and execute contracts for the sale of property made during the war—

In perpetuity, Mr. President, and I say to you now, sir, that I have knowledge of the fact that very recently in one or more great cities of this Union it has been openly proclaimed that the true purpose of this bill is simply to provide an opening for Government ownership of housing facilities throughout the United States, and that this request for an appropriation of $60,000,000 would be followed until the taxpayers provided at least $750,000,000 for the same purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want simply to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that when the bill was before the Senate, I think, the last time the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] offered an amendment to section 5, including the words "sell or," so that it would read "sell or rent."

Mr. FALL. I do not understand where that would come in in section 5.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the word "rent," in line 3, section 5, page 6, so that it would confer authority to sell or rent such property.

Mr. FALL. Then that would continue in perpetuity the power to sell or to rent. I can not think that the Senator from Massachusetts intended exactly that.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is referring to my colleague, not to me.

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I do not call attention to it now to dispute any statement the Senator has made or even question it, but I simply call attention to the fact that that is the way the section as amended reads, so that the Senator in making his motion to strike out will take that into consideration.

Mr. FALL. I think any motion would include that, because it is to strike out all after the word "authority," in line 3, down to and including the word "and," in line 4.

Mr. SMOOT. Only the Senate having acted upon it, we would have to reconsider the vote.

Mr. FALL. I do not think it has been acted upon.

Mr. LODGE. We reconsidered every amendment and went over the bill again.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I do not want to be understood for one moment as insinuating by anything I have said that other Senators in this body are not just as alive to the great issues that confront us, not only the war issues but the domestic issues, as I am. However, we are counseling together. We are attempting to frame legislation for the interests of the entire country. We are all equally sincere, undoubtedly, in our efforts in arriving at that end, and if I have spoken warmly upon this subject it is because I feel very deeply upon the subject. I ask the chairman of the committee to join me in calling a halt, because Congress can afterwards deal with the question and provide some method of disposing of the houses, and if then, after proper consideration, it is to be the policy that the National Government should go into the States and acquire private residences in the States and control the labor of a State in perpetuity, as well as in the national city of Washington, for this purpose, let us discuss it frankly and at great length and counsel together and do what is best then, but not hurriedly in a measure of this kind fasten that theory of government upon the statutes.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask leave to submit an amendment, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. How long does he think he will ask the Senate to continue in session to-night?

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to continue it for about 10 minutes longer and get through with this amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am willing to continue it for 10 minutes, but I do not know whether we will finish the amendment in that time.

Mr. SWANSON. In section 5 I should like to insert the words "care for," so that it would read "care for, sell, or rent such property." I should like to have that amendment made before the motion is made to strike out.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the mischief is in the words "care for and rent." That is what creates uses of the Government in perpetuity.

Mr. SWANSON. I will answer that at the proper time. I should like to include the words "care for" before "sell."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "rent," on page 6, line 3, in the part proposed to be stricken out, insert the words "care for, sell, or," so as to read "and care for, sell, or rent such property."

Mr. SWANSON. I offer that amendment.

Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico should not prevail. What would be the effect if that amendment prevailed? You would be compelled to sell the property at any price.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator permit an inquiry at that point?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would the Senator object to inserting language which would provide that the Government should dispose of the property as soon as practicable and as soon as it could be advantageously disposed of after the war?

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Later on, then, I shall propose it.

Mr. SWANSON. If the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico was adopted it would compel all this property to have contracts for sale at the conclusion of the war.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment? That is not my purpose, and I think he is very much mistaken.

Mr. SWANSON. I say the effect of it is, if you could not rent it, you would be compelled to sell it.

Mr. FALL. Oh, no.

Mr. SWANSON. You could not do anything but execute the conditions made during the war, and that would compel, I understand, a contract sale. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut is entirely satisfactory to me.

I am not in favor of continuing the rental of this property, except so far as it may be necessary for a reasonable length of time in order to get rid of the buildings after the conclusion of the war. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut would obviate any difficulty that might exist in connection with the continuation of the rental of the property.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator is very much mistaken in reference to my amendment requiring a sale of the property, for it would prevent it. The amendment would prevent anything being done with the property after the war until Congress itself, the representatives of the people of the United States, had spoken and said what should be done with it. That is all that I have asked.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken. When you strike out the words "as remains undisposed of and to conclude and execute contracts for the sale of property made during the war," the Government could not do anything with this property; it could not rent it or lease it. All that could be done would be to make and execute such contracts as might be made to dispose of it during the war.

Mr. FALL. The proposition that is contained now in this section is simply that all of the power of the President shall cease with the termination of the present war, except the power and authority to rent such property as remains undisposed of, and so forth. If we strike out the words which I have asked to strike out—"and to conclude and execute contracts for the sale of property made during the war"—if a present contract exists at the termination of the war for the sale of the property, of course it should be executed, and a contract made during the war, a pending contract, for the sale of the property should be executed.

Mr. SWANSON. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. FALL. I was explaining to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if that amendment prevails, at the termination of the war the Government would have to cease renting this property immediately, and no rents could be collected. As I understand the amendment, all that could be done would be to execute contracts for sale. I cheerfully accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut; I am in thorough accord with him; I think that is the right thing to do, to protect the Government and to show that there is no disposition to continue this business indefinitely.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion to the Senator, I am sure the Senator does not desire to establish Government ownership in perpetuity any more than the rest of us do, and we ought to have some provision drawn on the lines of the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico or the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, which would cover that. I should like to suggest to the Senator that we have a reprint of the bill with the amendments already adopted, so that we may see to-morrow just what has been done, and then amendments can be prepared to section 5—the Senator from Connecticut can prepare one and the Senator from New Mexico can prepare one, and they can be printed and be before us for consideration.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LODGE. I think a reprint of the bill would be very useful, because we have adopted a good many amendments, and there has been some confusion about them.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that; and I am about to move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senator does that I should like to suggest two or three verbal amendments, to which, I think, the Senator will agree, and I think it would be desirable to have them made before the bill is reprinted. On page 6, lines 8 and 9, I move to strike out the words "of his department," as we are not now dealing in the bill with the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. SWANSON. That change ought to be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 6, page 6, line 8, after the word "transactions," it is proposed to strike out the words "of his department."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 24 I move to strike out after the word "transaction" the words "of the department."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 6, page 6, line 24, after the word "transaction," it is proposed to strike out the words "of the department."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 3, on page 7, after the word "transactions," I move to strike out the words "of his department."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to suggest to the Senator that at the top of page 7 it would be well to strike out the words "in the existing war," after the words "declaration of peace." That is surplusage, and I move to strike out those words.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that being done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 6, page 7, line 1, after the word "peace," it is proposed to strike out the words "in the existing war."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now may I call the Senator's attention to the phraseology in line 8, on page 7, and the subsequent amendment reported by the committee. I refer to the words, in line 7, "or under a percentage or cost-plus basis, nor contract for more than," and so forth. There ought to be a period after the word "basis," and the word "nor" should be changed to "No," beginning with a capital "N."

Mr. SWANSON. I think there would be considerable discussion as to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is so palpable that it does not read right that it should be changed.

Mr. SWANSON. Very well; I will offer no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move, therefore, to insert a period after the word "basis" instead of a comma, and then commence the proposed amendment recommended to be inserted by the committee with the word "No," with a capital "N," instead of the word "nor." That will make it right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask if the order for which I asked has been granted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be reprinted as amended.

Mr. SWANSON. On page 6, in line 3, some words which were in the House bill have been left out, which I ask to have inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 3, before the word "rent," it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and to insert the words "sell or," so that it will read: "to care for, sell, or rent such property."

Mr. LODGE. That does not remove the difficulty at all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think I have an amendment pending. I offer it before I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SWANSON. The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico is still pending.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer as an amendment a proviso to come in at the end of section 6, page 7, a new amendment, which I ask may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has not been disposed of; that amendment is pending.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator may offer his amendment, so that it may be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My amendment is already printed. I understand I am not in order, then, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to present an amendment for printing and to lie on the table, which I intend to propose to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SWANSON. If any other Senators have amendments to offer, I shall be glad to have them offer them now.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to offer an amendment, to be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In justice to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], the Chair will say that on the statement of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], that he would conclude in about 10 minutes, the Chair said to the Senator from Indiana, if he wanted to introduce an amendment, it might be introduced to-morrow.

Mr. SWANSON. There is no purpose to preclude the introduction of any amendment; that can be done at any time; but it is simply desired to have the amendments printed. My purpose is now to ask that when the Senate concludes its session to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have drawn the amendment very hastily, simply as a basis for an idea, and I may want to modify it somewhat to-morrow. I should like, however, to have it printed and stated by the Secretary as I have drawn it, so that it will be in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 5, page 6, it is proposed to add the following:

Such property shall be sold as soon after the conclusion of the war as it can be advantageously done.

Mr. SWANSON. I think there is a purpose to have an executive session for a few minutes. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its session to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Virginia asks that at not later than 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to bring to the attention of those Senators present that to-night at 8 o'clock, in the House Office Building, on the third floor, in the majority assembly room, there will be a lecture upon what has been done for wounded soldiers in the line of rehabilitation, and also pictures. All Senators and their friends are invited.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 1, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 30, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, move Thou upon our hearts with all Thy quickening power, lest in the crucial test, through which the world is passing, we forget.

Increase and multiply our faith in Thee and the eternal truths Thou hast ordained, that we may be true to our convictions; that right, not might, will prevail; religion, not materialism; civilization, not barbarism; democracy, not autocracy; liberty, not oppression.

Uphold our allies in their brave struggle; increase our Army and Navy, that we may be a potent factor with them in establishing justice, peace, righteousness in all the world; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as in heaven.

Hear us in the name of the world's great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, be excused for to-day on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks that his colleague [Mr. JOHNSON of Washington] be excused to-day on account of illness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD on the subject of American seamen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks leave to extend his remarks on the subject of American seamen. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE CAPSTICK.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House set aside Sunday, May 19, for addresses on the life, character, and public services of my late colleague, JOHN H. CAPSTICK, late a Representative from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that Sunday, May 19, be set apart for memorial services to his late colleague, Mr. CAPSTICK. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3771. An act authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

THE RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of April 26 appear remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. This speech appears in the RECORD of April 29, the same except with some minor corrections. I assume that the gentleman would not be averse to having the first print of the speech go out of the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. The first print should go out. I do not know how it happened, but it has happened twice in succession in the Printing Office that my speeches have not been correctly printed, and the mistakes of the Printing Office have made me appear to say things that I did not say. In the second print of this speech the Government Printing Office inserted an entire page of manuscript which was left out in the first print.

Mr. GILLETT. How long after the speech was delivered was it printed the first time?

Mr. HEFLIN. It was made on April 5, and I left the city that night to make some speeches in favor of the liberty loan, and did not get back until about the 20th of the month. The speech was not printed until Friday morning.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman waited three weeks, and then had it printed wrong.

Mr. HEFLIN. I corrected the mistake here as soon as I discovered it.

Mr. GILLETT. Did not the gentleman correct it before it went to the Printing Office the first time?

Mr. HEFLIN. The Printing Office left out an entire page of typewritten manuscript, page 2 of the speech.

Mr. GILLETT. It is a little extraordinary that these things happen to the gentleman and to no one else.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think so, too. There must be a pro-German in the Government Printing Office. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the first print will go out.

There was no objection.

REHABILITATION OF DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak not exceeding two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to speak not exceeding two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, there is being held a joint hearing by the Senate Committee on Education and the House Committee on Education on the bill (H. R. 11367) for the rehabilitation of disabled soldiers. To-night at 8 o'clock in the majority room of the House Office Building there will be given a lecture with moving pictures illustrating what has been accomplished by Canada for the purpose of taking care of disabled soldiers. I sincerely trust the Members of the House will be present and that they will bring their wives with them. This is a very important bill, a war measure, and a hearty invitation is extended to each and every Member to be present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for 30 days, not for the purpose of attending to any business, not on account of sickness, but I want to open my campaign in Georgia for the United States Senate [applause], and I hope that my friends on both sides will be liberal enough to grant this request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for 30 days' leave of absence to run for Senator. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1919, for the payment of all expenses of carrying out the provisions of this act, including personal services, traveling, and subsistence expenses, the payment for rent, the purchase of equipment, supplies, postage, printing, publications, and such other articles, both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the Secretary of the Interior may deem essential.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 18, line 4, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois a question. Does he not think it would be wise to insert in this section 17, in line 11, an amendment that would authorize the payment of the cost of explorations out of the $500,000 fund appropriated? It is intended to go into the public land of the United States, according to the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], authorizing explorations into Government lands, and make examination for the existence of these precious minerals. There is no provision in this bill covering that special service which is now put in by the amendment which was inserted authorizing such examinations into the public domain and was not in the original bill. I ask the gentleman if he does not think that ought to be covered and allowed by an amendment now inserted?

Mr. FOSTER. No; and I will tell the gentleman why. There is a fund now appropriated by Congress in the last deficiency appropriation bill, I think, providing for the appropriation of $150,000 for doing that very work, and it would only add to that, and I do not believe that it is necessary to put it in here.

Mr. ROBBINS. I presume the gentleman refers to the testimony of Dr. Manning, found on page 68 of the hearings, in which he says that the Bureau of Mines has $150,000 recently given by Congress and an item of $100,000 more from July 1 last, which will enable that bureau to gather valuable information concerning mineral resources by the use of this $250,000.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what the gentleman had reference to.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is that the fund that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; that is to explore; to find out what we have.

Mr. ROBBINS. I raise the question now because of the amendment inserted by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] permitting the exploration of Government lands, and I want to know whether this fund, to which Dr. Manning refers in his testimony, amounting now to $250,000, is intended to cover that? If it is, I shall not offer any amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought under that allowance that they could do that work.

Mr. ROBBINS. If they can not do it, then this bill ought to be amended to permit them to do so; but if that covers this situation, I shall not offer the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is no doubt that they can.

Mr. ROBBINS. With that information I shall not offer the amendment I otherwise would offer.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of reaching some definite position I stated early in the consideration of this bill that at the proper time I would offer an amendment reducing the amount of the general appropriation from $50,000,000 to $10,000,000. I notice that the sum of $500,000 is carried here in excess of the $50,000,000. In other words, the entire appropriation for the consummation of this measure will be $50,500,000. On page 33 of the hearings Dr. Smith or Mr. Baruch comments on the fact that there is $150,000 carried in the deficiency appropriation bill, allowed for extra investigations, which have heretofore not been made by the Department of the Interior, and the prospective allowance of $100,000 for the coming year, which in the aggregate would make $250,000. That supplemented by this allowance of $500,000, if this bill is passed in the terms which it now carries, would give the Department of the Interior $750,000 for the purpose of making the investigation and carrying out the administrative policy of this measure. I move to strike out the sum of "$500,000," in line 4, page 18, and to insert "$250,000." My purpose is quite apparent. With the $150,000 already carried in the deficiency appropriation bill, and the $100,000 to be carried next year, making $250,000, added to the $250,000 that I propose, will make the $500,000 proposed in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I do not care to have any more time on this amendment, but I would like to have a little more time on the amendment reducing the amount in the next section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Page 18, line 4, strike out "$500,000" and insert "$250,000."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this is only an authorization for an appropriation. When the bill was originally drafted it provided $1,000,000 for the administration of the law. After the committee had gone through the original bill and had changed the location from an indefinite one, in which the President would appoint some administrator of the bill, it was placed in the hands of the Department of the Interior; it was then thought that with the organization which they had there and which could be utilized, the appropriation could be reduced one-half. It was accordingly cut down from one million to five hundred thousand.

Of course, as the committee understands, this $500,000 is not an appropriation at this time, but the Appropriations Committee later would take up the matter and determine after hearings, I take it, as they have always done heretofore these propositions and give what is necessary.

I do not know, and of course I can not tell, what it will cost to administer the bill, but from talking with the men who were before us and who would probably have the administration of the bill if it goes into the Department of the Interior, up to July 1, 1919, they would probably require this much money to carry out the provisions of the bill and do the work efficiently. That is the reason we left it. It is only an authorization and does not make an appropriation. For that reason I would rather that it would not be cut down to $250,000.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I have read the hearings carefully. If this bill has a pressing need for adoption, I want to find it. I have not been yet able to find anywhere in the hearings any statement indicating that $500,000 is necessary or is an advisable amount to be devoted to the administration of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. When the committee spent two or three days in considering the bill the men connected with the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines and the War Mineral Board were before us, and this matter was talked over. It does not appear in the hearings. The original amount that the bill proposed of $1,000,000, after discussing the matter fully and after the bill had been changed, placing it in the hands of the Interior Department, that amount was cut down to $500,000. It was their judgment that it would probably require that amount of money. Of course they will make their showing before the Committee on Appropriations as to what ought to be done.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is not proposed under this bill to create another new bureau or a new head of a bureau?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. It simply extends the bureau in the Interior Department?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt, if it becomes a law and goes into the Interior Department, that it will be administered by the Geological Survey or the Bureau of Mines by those men now in the department.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is not the purpose of the bill to create another new activity?

Mr. FOSTER. No. The men that are employed there now are employed under appropriations for doing other work. Of course, they can not do this work and that work, too, which they are now doing.

Mr. McKENZIE. So they must have additional help?

Mr. FOSTER. They are bound to, in order to administer the law.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. What is the character of this expense to be?

Mr. FOSTER. The employment of men in connection with the guarantee of price of material. They will have to have men to look after that and men, probably, to look after the different producers throughout the United States and to see that the law is not violated.

Mr. GORDON. Would it be part of the administration of the law to grubstake a man to go out and look for minerals?

Mr. FOSTER. Not one penny goes for that purpose.

Mr. GORDON. Five hundred thousand dollars would hire a good many experts.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is right about that, but that is not the intention, and it will not be done. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, after line 13, insert the following:
"The maximum salary to be paid under the provisions of this act shall not exceed the rate of $4,500 per annum for any scientific, technological, or administrative service, and shall not exceed the rate of $1,800 per annum for any clerical or other subordinate service."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is in harmony with the present law in reference to the employment of scientific men in the Agricultural Department out of a lump sum and the other departments of the Government that have lump sums out of which they employ people of this character. I will state for the benefit of the committee that I understand those having charge of the bill have no objection to this amendment. Eighteen hundred dollars is also the highest price paid to class 4 employees under the civil service. So this gives the administration the leeway that they are entitled to, and the only limitation is on the top salaries paid to employees.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Is there any limitation now affecting the $4,500 men?

Mr. SISSON. None in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. If the scientific people who are interested and have been interested for years under similar appropriations begin to educate young men in colleges to make them competent and put college professors on the salary roll—oh, the gentleman will recollect the scandals there were about that a few years ago—is there any limitation now upon the expenditures of this fund along that line?

Mr. SISSON. Well, I will state there is no limitation in the bill now. That is my purpose in offering this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. But as to the number of people——

Mr. SISSON. As I understand, the practical operation of this bill will be that when the department shall organize it will be necessary then that they come to the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of getting money to carry this law into operation. That being true, in the organization of its affairs I thought it well enough to let the gentlemen in charge of the operations of the bill under the Bureau of Mines know that the same limitations were upon them under this bill that are now on the Secretary of Agriculture in the employment of like services.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman does not seek by his amendment the authorization to limit the number of experts to 20, 40, 100, or 200?

Mr. SISSON. No; I state frankly that I have no idea in the world as to the number it will take. If I knew the number that could reasonably perform the service, I should be very glad to put it in the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. When the Appropriations Committee comes to consider the appropriating the money, would that committee go into that phase of it?

Mr. SISSON. That is my judgment about it, and they then would have to demonstrate to the Committee on Appropriations the need for every man that they employ. The only limitation that they would be under here would be the employment of any of these men to get together their preliminary organization, and they could not employ for a year and put on the pay roll any man at more than $4,500.

Mr. CANNON. I understand.

Mr. SISSON. Of course, it does not mean every man would get $4,500; and after they present their pay roll to the Committee on Appropriations, their salary roll to that committee, the limitation here would prevent them from entering into any negotiations with anybody for more than $4,500.

Mr. CANNON. But I understand that the gentleman recollects, if the gentleman will yield further——

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That some years ago one of the fiercest contests I ever witnessed in this House under the leadership of the Committee on Appropriations—and I recollect at that time that Mr. Tawney, I believe, was the chairman—was to cut off an abuse that originated in the Department of Agriculture, I believe, in the Forestry Service, where they absolutely were paying the expenses of students in one or more State universities to be educated so that they might be capable in forestry.

Mr. SISSON. And the gentleman will recollect at that time some of the employees were getting enormous salaries.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. And that brought about a limitation on the Agricultural bill, limiting the employment of these technological and scientific men to $4,500 and the only purpose of this amendment, and the chairman of the committee and those in charge of the bill, as I understand, have no objection to it.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection in the world to the gentleman offering the amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This makes an authorization of $500,000, and it is a very broad one, for the payment of all the expenses of carrying out the provisions of this act, including personal services, traveling and subsistence expenses, the payment of rent, printing publications and such other articles, and so forth. Why, under this it would be lawful to run an advertising campaign, have publications, and such things have been done. I do not want it done as a war measure. Now, again. It says here for rent. Why, the Interior Department has just moved into that magnificent building, the most roomy public building in the United States if not in the world. The Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines are lodged there. Are they going to build some more public buildings? Is that contemplated?

Mr. FOSTER. May I say to my colleague, if he will yield——

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say this, that the Department of the Interior has a new building, went into it the latter part of last year or the first of this. That building is now filled up, and I will say there is also a part of the War Department, as I understand, in that building now.

Mr. CANNON. Which is soon to go out.

Mr. FOSTER. If it does, it will make room, but we do not know whether they will have to have quarters outside or not. They may have to have them, probably will be compelled on account of being filled up.

Mr. CANNON. I trust not. This payment for rent would allow in San Francisco, in Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, or anywhere else the payment of rent, and it is simply wonderful, and I speak of them respectfully, of what the scientists and the alleged scientists—and there are some alleged scientists who are not scientists—how industrious they are to get upon the pay roll, and they want to have things, and many of them want to travel.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, that may be so.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; that is so.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether it is all so or not.

Mr. CANNON. I think I will just move, in order to test the sense of the House, to strike out "rent."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Does the gentleman withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. On page 18, line 9, after the word "expenses," strike out the words, in lines 9 and 10, "payment for rent."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 18, line 9, after the word "expenses," strike out "the payment for rent."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word. I hope the committee will not strike this out. This same provision was in the explosive bill, but it was not used. I think we can wisely trust to the Secretary of the Interior in this matter, to the end that if he has not sufficient room down there in the department to place these people who will have to do this work, that he ought to have that right to place them somewhere else, and it will be passed on by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on the Appropriations Committee. It might be necessary to rent a building some place, and I am sure we can trust the Secretary. We did it under the explosive bill, and he never paid a cent for rent. So I think the discretion will be wisely placed.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The Federal Vocational Board is operating under a law that carried an annual appropriation of $200,000, and they thought it included the privilege of rental; but it did not, and for a year nearly the Federal Vocational Board had been compelled to pay it out of their own pockets, because they could not find quarters, up until recently, when the deficiency bill allowed the amount to reimburse them for what they had paid out.

Mr. FOSTER. I remember that.

Mr. FESS. It caused considerable distress, not only individually, but inefficient effort on the part of the board.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if the gentleman will allow me—and I do not care about applying for recognition again—the gentleman knows and I know, and I think every other Member of this House knows, that no man ever lived that could go outside of everything that is being done and that the President is charged with being responsible for, being the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He must pick out people to do the work. No man ever occupied the position of Secretary of the Interior, I do not care how able he was—and what I am going to say is more true now, two or three fold, than ever heretofore—that could get outside of all the details of these various industries. He must trust somebody. Well, whom does he trust? Why, he trusts the Bureau of Mines, he trusts the Geological Survey, and God knows how many more people he does trust. He has to trust somebody. Now, I think it proper to call the gentleman's attention to that fact, because I apprehend that there will be a great many thousands of dollars asked for the payment of rent.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that is correct. I do not think there is going to be any great force under this.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That for the purposes of this act the sum of $50,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available as a revolving fund during the time this act is in effect: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purposes described in the preceding section: Provided further, That itemized statements covering all purchases and disbursements under this and the preceding section shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 25th day of each month after the taking effect of this act, covering the business of the preceding month, and said statements shall be subject to public inspection.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

On page 18, line 15, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On line 15, page 18, strike out the figures "$50,000,000" and insert "$10,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 18, line 15, strike out "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have carefully studied this bill and the hearings on it and I do not think it has been shown that $50,000,000 is necessary to effectuate the purposes of it. During the discussion that we have had on the bill by members of the committee I believe that very good reasons have been advanced for the development in this country of an adequate supply of the ores and the metals enumerated in this bill, and that it is probably necessary to do so as a war measure in the manner provided for in this bill. But while I believe that a good case has been made out in that respect I do not believe that the members of the committee have anywhere demonstrated that $50,000,000 is necessary to effectuate that purpose, but that, on the contrary, much less than that sum will be sufficient to answer the purposes at this time.

If my memory serves me correctly, the expenses of carrying on the war have now reached the enormous total of more than $1,000,000,000 a month, and I submit that that is a very large amount of money, and is a scale of expenditures which is bound to eventually tax the sufficiency of the resources of a country even as rich as the United States. And while I am sure that Congress and the President and all of the executive departments of the Government will endeavor to keep these enormous expenses from further expanding in every proper way that they can, still I am sure that, in spite of all that can be done, these expenses will continue to grow. They will increase because our proper war activities will continue to expand as the war progresses. Therefore I think that the responsibility rests upon Congress in the exercise of its constitutional duties to keep down these appropriations wherever it can properly be done and without hindering and obstructing our war preparations in any way whatever. I think that the present measure is one of those cases where some scaling down of the appropriation can properly be done, and that is why I have offered my amendment.

Now, in reading the report of the committee, in reading the testimony of Secretary Lane, in reading the testimony of other gentlemen who have testified in the hearings, I do not see where it has anywhere been demonstrated that $50,000,000 is necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act. The fund is a revolving fund. And after the act goes into effect, if it is demonstrated that it is practical, if it is demonstrated that an adequate supply of these metals and ores can be obtained here in the United States, why Congress will still be in session, and if the Secretary of the Interior thinks that more money is necessary to carry on the work, I am sure that Congress will be ready and willing to authorize the appropriation. Congress has been very prompt and willing to vote all the needed appropriations, and I am sure that it will not manifest any contrary disposition in the future; therefore, I think that at this time we ought not to authorize a greater appropriation for this purpose than $10,000,000. That is why I have offered the amendment. I have no desire whatever to cripple the bill or impair the effectuating of its purpose. My only desire is to keep down appropriations to real necessities in order that the resources of the country may prove adequate to meet the great strain of the war.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word or two on my own responsibility in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. I stated in general debate here in relation to this matter that I did not know whether they were going to need $10,000,000, $25,000,000, $50,000,000, or $100,000,000 to carry out the purposes of this law, if it becomes a law.

I can conceive that if the operation should remain normal in a way—that is, that the ore might be mined, these minerals secured, and flow directly to the places of consumption—the Government perhaps would not have to use any of this money. On the other hand I can conceive of a condition that might arise where it will be necessary for the Government to protect its guarantee by the purchase and the storage and the holding and afterwards selling of a large amount of this material; and in that event it would require undoubtedly $50,000,000 and maybe $100,000,000. So I say that it is utterly impossible for us to know accurately how much money is going to be needed.

Now, men who are familiar with these things, as much so as men can be—and I refer to the experts in the Bureau of Mines and in the Geological Survey, and geologists throughout the country, men who use and consume these minerals—they have told us that they thought it would be safe to say $50,000,000 would or might be needed, and I do not know of any better authority than those men upon that proposition.

Now, one thing I would say to my friend from Texas [Mr. BLACK], and I know he is perfectly sincere and would not withhold a penny that the Government would need in order to effectuate this law—that this is not an appropriation but is only an authorization. It may be that when the matter comes before the Committee on Appropriations progress will have been made to the extent that a better and more accurate conclusion as to the amount may be reached. I am not wedded to the amount.

This is the view I take of it: If there is any use for the passage of this bill at all, it is because it deals with war necessities, and I think it does, and very vitally so. Then if that be true we ought not to hamper or handicap or embarrass the administration in the execution of this law by withholding from them the necessary amount of money to carry on the operations.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HAMLIN. So I say I believe we ought to trust, that we will make no mistake in trusting, the men who are just as patriotic as we are and very much better advised than we are in the question of the amount we ought to authorize. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that there is no authorization for the use of this revolving fund except that contained in section 11. Section 11 provides for the purchase and the storing and the resale of these various mineral necessaries, so that it is not for the purpose of purchase, and the $50,000,000 revolving fund can not be used for the purpose of purchasing supplies for the Government. I noticed in reading the hearings that nearly all of these men, in referring to the amount necessary being $50,000,000, continually, as you will see by their testimony, have in mind the fact of the purchases on the part of the Government. Now, the Government is not going to purchase these things, except in this way: Appropriations will be made from the various departments for the purchase. This bill does not provide for the purchase of a dollar's worth of property by the Government. It only authorizes the purchase of these things, for the storing of them, and the reselling of them out of this revolving fund. Now, if that be true, it certainly seems to me that the amount is grossly excessive, and that certainly $10,000,000 would be ample for the purpose.

Mr. HAMLIN. Section 14, of course, does provide for the purchase of materials.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; but not out of the revolving fund.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill provides that the Government may guarantee a minimum price. Then, it provides that the Government purchase outright, and it provides for requisitioning and taking over these materials.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was up last week I stated to the committee that at the proper time I would present an amendment reducing the amount of the appropriation. I had no particular interest or pride in introducing such an amendment, and I am very glad it has been presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. The argument—that is, the one that seems to present the most force in the minds of the committee in opposition to reducing any appropriation in the bill—is that the Committee on Appropriations will ultimately pass upon such appropriation.

There may be some force in that position, and I was willing to yield to it in regard to the previous section; but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Committee on Appropriations is bound to be guided and governed by the action of the House in Committee of the Whole. If the Committee of the Whole places the appropriation in this bill at $50,000,000, the Committee on Appropriations is bound to recognize the action of this House.

Let me call the attention of the committee to another fact. A great many men in this House have at some previous time sat in other legislative bodies. I do not believe that any man who has had that experience has ever seen a bureau or department of government, whether it be State or Nation, which did not expend to the very limit of the appropriation. That is human. It is a fault, but it is a human fault, which seems not to be avoidable.

If this House appropriates $50,000,000 to carry out the purposes of this bill, you can be sure that every penny of the $50,000,000 will be expended. If it is necessary to have $50,000,000 after they get into the operation of this bill, as was very aptly stated by a gentleman on that side of the House, this Congress will be in session and the temper of this House has often been expressed; if it is necessary to make the appropriation, this House will get together, as it did on the naval appropriation bill, and spend $140,000,000 an hour without a dissenting vote and without an argument. Therefore the committee may have no fear if it can come before this House or the Committee of the Whole and show a case, that this House will not gladly respond; but I think it is folly to place in an appropriation bill an amount of money that, according to the undivided statements of the committee itself, is purely speculative and arbitrary.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], striking out "$50,000,000" and inserting "$25,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

Mr. COX. I am offering it as an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COX: Line 15, page 18, strike out "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000,000."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of course I do not know how much money will be needed to administer this bill. I do feel, however, that a $50,000,000 authorization is an exorbitant amount. I feel that it is far too much, and I indorse every statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT], that while the Committee on Appropriations is not bound by an authorization, yet if this bill becomes a law, authorizing the expenditure of $50,000,000 to administer it, for some reason, by some excuse, in some way or some manner, somehow those charged with its responsibility will find a way to come before the Appropriations Committee and get the full amount authorized in the bill. I wonder if it is not time this Congress, to some extent at least, should begin to lay its hands upon the purse strings of the Treasury of the United States? This may be an important bill in some respects. In fact, it may be to some extent a necessity; but I feel assured of this, and I think each one of you feel assured that as this war progresses from year to year, if it can be demonstrated to Congress that $25,000,000 is not enough to administer this bill, Congress will be willing and anxious to appropriate whatever may be necessary. But the point I desire to make is this, not to put in this bill an authorization of $50,000,000, because if you do it will be spent whether necessary or not, whether it will yield back to this Government 100 cents on the dollar or not, or whether it will yield back anything, and here is an opportunity to begin to teach somebody in the various bureaus down the Avenue that Congress to some extent is going to lay its hands upon the purse strings of the Treasury, and not yield to the insistent demands of the departments for not alone a million dollars, but millions on top of millions. I am very much afraid this war is going on for some time. We do not know yet how much we have got into it, but if this war goes on for three or four years more, where is the money coming from with which to finance it?

The time will come before long when the people will have invested all of their liquid capital in bonds and but one other source will be left, and that will be taxation. Now, I hope that my amendment will carry. I believe that an authorization of $25,000,000 is sufficient. I believe it will serve notice upon those charged with the responsibility of administering it that they must use it economically; that this money must not be spent in the building up here in the city of Washington of tremendous bureaus, with hundreds, yes, thousands, of employees here in the city of Washington and elsewhere, with exorbitant salaries, trooping over the country, drawing salaries with their transportation paid.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has offered a substitute at $25,000,000. Will the vote come upon that first?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, suppose the gentleman's substitute is defeated, what then? Under certain circumstances I would be for his amendment. I think $25,000,000 is better than $50,000,000.

Mr. COX. That is what I think.

Mr. CANNON. But why could we not vote on the $10,000,000 proposition first? I think $10,000,000 is enough.

Mr. COX. It may be.

Mr. CANNON. If that is voted down, then we could vote on the $25,000,000 proposition.

Mr. GORDON. Let us vote on the $10,000,000 proposition first.

Mr. COX. I was afraid the Committee of the Whole would not adopt the $10,000,000 amendment, feeling that perchance it might be too small a sum, and so out of an abundance of caution I have offered my amendment for $25,000,000. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says, $25,000,000 is better than $50,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER rose and was recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the gentleman from Iowa begins, I wonder if we could agree on time on this section and all amendments thereto? I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 35 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hardly think that is enough for all gentlemen who wish to speak.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman will save time if he lets the debate proceed.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the request for the present.

Mr. TOWNER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he will consider a request for unanimous consent that the vote be taken first on the $10,000,000 proposition?

Mr. FOSTER. I would not like to do that. Frankly, I will say that $10,000,000 is entirely too small an amount to do anything with. Now, if it comes to $25,000,000, that is a different proposition.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. CANNON. If the $25,000,000 proposition is voted down, being a substitute, then we could vote on the $10,000,000 proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. I should fight the $10,000,000 proposition very hard.

Mr. CANNON. If that is voted down, I suppose we could vote on $12,000,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the proper way would be to vote on the smallest amount first, and then on the other.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, if this is to be taken out of my time, I decline to yield further.

Mr. CANNON. Not in the gentleman's time—a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. What was the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]?

The CHAIRMAN. He offered a substitute.

Mr. SISSON. He offered it as a substitute, and then withdrew that and said he offered it as an amendment.

Mr. KINCHELOE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If the gentleman from Indiana were to withdraw his amendment or substitute, or whatever he cares to call it, and the vote was taken on the Black amendment and defeated, could he not offer it as an amendment to the $50,000,000 sum?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for five minutes from this time.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure there is no man on the floor who would not vote for $50,000,000, or any sum that might be necessary, for the successful prosecution of the war. The only question here is whether in forming this revolving fund, which is for the purpose of purchasing and storing commodities that are named in the bill, $50,000,000 is not an amount altogether too large. It occurs to me in reading the hearings before the committee that no such amount can possibly be used; that $50,000,000 is only an invitation to people to go out and use it, draw on it for the purpose of developing wildcat projects, projects not now in existence, and that it will be a temptation for squandering and losing the money. Ten million dollars, and certainly $25,000,000, will be an abundant fund for the purchase of anything that is necessary to be stored or accumulated for use in this war and then resold. The very idea of a revolving fund implies not only the purchase of commodities but the sale of them. This would mean the purchase of property and the resale of it. I think it is an unwise thing to put into the bill an amount for that purpose as great as $50,000,000.

I do not think there is any man here that would for a minute believe that it could be used unless it was used for speculative purposes. I have gone somewhat carefully through the various things enumerated in the bill and the testimony in regard to them. There are only two articles that you might say in this bill are imperatively necessary, which we could not produce. Take ferromanganese, the testimony is unequivocal that in a short time we can produce ferromanganese, because it is already in existence. We have an abundance of sulphur and pyrites for the manufacture of sulphuric acid. Not one single dollar is necessary, in my judgment, to secure an abundant supply of pyrites and sulphur for sulphuric acid. We have the most tremendous deposit of sulphur known in the world in Louisiana and Texas. The sulphur of Louisiana is 98 per cent pure, and there is no such deposit anywhere else in the known world. We do not need a single dollar to develop that. All that is necessary is that the price should be sufficient to make development attractive. The power is given so that the Government can do it if it is necessary. So these things do not require nearly that amount of money.

In reading the hearings it is taken into consideration that $50,000,000 shall be used for the purchase of articles the Government needs, but that is not contemplated by the bill. This is not an appropriation bill. The appropriation will have to be made by the Committee on Appropriations. I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that they heard the statement made by the chairman of the Appropriation Committee, Mr. SHERLEY, on the floor regarding this very bill. He said that if this authorization were made the Appropriations Committee would feel under obligations to follow out the action of the House and make the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss whether this authorization ought to be $50,000,000, $25,000,000, or $10,000,000, but I want to discuss matters incidental to that question. The issue here is, as I understand it, what the authorization should be in dollars and cents. It does seem to me that gentlemen should be able to discuss that without making remarks that necessarily reflect upon high officials of our Government. I do not believe that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] was accurate, or the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was accurate, or the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] was accurate, when they said that inevitably whatever amount is authorized will be spent. I am sure they are right in making the statement that it is likely to be spent. Congress has this responsibility, but I doubt the propriety of gentlemen who come in here and stand for the integrity of their bills, and vote to appropriate salaries for thousands and thousands and thousands of clerks not authorized by existing law but requested by bureaus, and then denounce the administration of the affairs of this Republic at this particular time for its prodigality, waste, and practical oppression of the people.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman is mistaken in the statement he has just made. The statute fixes the clerks of class 1, class 2, class 3, and class 4, and other officials, so that any number of clerks can be appropriated for so far as a point of order is concerned.

Mr. RUCKER. I recognize the accuracy of the gentleman's remark, but it is left for the Appropriation Committee to determine the number of clerks required and needed in these classes.

Mr. CANNON. The House determines the class, and they can increase or decrease.

Mr. RUCKER. The House may vote down a bill entirely, but gentlemen come here with very large increases in number of clerks, and then in the cloakroom these same gentlemen have sometimes said—not in committee—that the departments are going wild in their demands for clerks and that it ought to be stopped, and I think they are right about that. Yet they bring in their bills and ask the House to vote for so many clerks, and then the same gentlemen complain they can not get through the corridors of these massive buildings in Washington on account of the horde of clerks. I have recently returned from my home State, and I was surprised to hear of the number of people who expected to come to Washington in the very near future in response to examinations held by the Civil Service Commission for places in the various departments. My notion about it is that sometimes unintentionally gentlemen are guilty of making extravagant statements on the floor of this House that are as unpatriotic as statements which have landed other men behind the bars, and I think in this hour of peril, in this abnormal time, when new conditions confront us, conditions never dreamed of by men before, that it is unbecoming—and I am not trying to lecture the House—for gentlemen to stand up here and publish to the world the recklessness with which the Government of the United States is extracting money from the people and expending it with a prodigal hand. If we are spending too much, we ought to stop it, but we ought not to make the appropriation and then denounce the men who expend it for doing the very thing we authorized and invited them to do. As to this matter I can not tell. My judgment is that $50,000,000 is too high, and I am inclined to think $10,000,000 is enough and probably as much as ought to be expended.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend particularly the closing words of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] when he said that we ought not to make these great big appropriations and afterwards complain because the money is expended. Yet that is what we have been doing right along. Then we complain because the money was paid out, when as a matter of fact we ought to censure ourselves for ever having made the appropriations to begin with, not knowing what the money was going to be expended for. That is the trouble now. We do not know what this money is going to be expended for. Gentlemen on the other side who have the bill in charge do not know what this money is to be expended for. In some respects that is not to be wondered at, because they are starting out a new bureau, and they can not be entirely certain about the methods which will have to be pursued in carrying out the purposes of the bill, but it is very clear to me that we ought not to go any farther in this way than can be avoided. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] was right when he said a moment ago that we would soon arrive at a time when we would wonder where all the money is going to come from. I want to tell the House as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means that we have reached that point now. We are wondering where the money is going to come from, and it ought to give us pause right here and on this bill. How is the liberty loan coming? It is not all subscribed yet. It is not strange that it is not all subscribed, considering the enormous amount that is required. Of course, it will be subscribed. I know that, but there will have to be another loan, and our financial difficulties will increase with each month of the war, and we can not be too careful about making appropriations not absolutely necessary.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. In answer to the question as to the liberty loan, my opinion is that the farmers of this country are going to subscribe more than $3,000,000,000. All through the country, blooming as it is with the finest prospect of a crop that the world ever knew, the farmers are subscribing liberally.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes; my own State went over the top first of all, and my district went over the top, far beyond it. Every county in my district subscribed from three to four times its allotment. That is very true, but we have got to have an immense amount of money more in another year. We have had an unfortunate experience, a very unfortunate experience, which ought to warn us as to how this matter will result. We appropriated altogether very nearly $1,000,000,000 for aircraft production? Where has that money gone? Is there any gentleman on this floor who can tell me where it has gone and what has been done with it? Can he explain in any reasonable way what we have to show for it? No one either on this floor or on the floor at the other end of the Capitol can answer that question. We have built only one or two battle planes, and we do not know where the money has gone.

I want it to be understood that I am not now criticizing so much those who expended the money as I am criticizing ourselves for appropriating the money, not knowing what was going to be done with it, and not directing how it should be spent. That is how the trouble came about. It comes right back here to us, and we have to think about it in these times. If we continue in this sort of way we will never be able to finance this war. We must get down to some reasonable basis. If the committee will tell us how much they must have for their immediate requirements we will vote it without a minute's hesitation. If they come in at some future day and say that they have spent so much and tell us how they spent it and that they want more money for another purpose, we will vote it, and it will not take us 10 minutes to do it.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that coming in without specifying the needs is getting us into an attitude of mind where no matter what they bring in—and they might just as well brought in $150,000,000 as not—where we feel we must not inquire, because it is in the interest of war. I think that is a very serious situation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is quite correct. If they would ask $100,000,000 on this bill we would have been just as able to explain it as to explain why it was $50,000,000.

But, Mr. Chairman, some day we will have to explain why we voted away these great sums without knowing what was going to be done with the money. The excuse will not be accepted that we were told it was for war purposes. The people will say, and say rightly, that we ought to have known how the money was going to be spent or fixed the manner of the expenditure in the bill.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have been trying in the best way I could ever since this session of Congress to get the House to stop, look, and listen, and to utter a word of warning against the wanton and extravagant waste of the financial resources of this country, but as yet it does not seem as if anyone has been able to set a brake. We can not slow down or stop it at all. Now, this war has resolved itself into a question of exhaustion, an exhaustion of men and an exhaustion of money. The question on the western front to-day as it presents itself to the world is, Who has the most men and the greatest number of reserves? That is one side of the war; that is one of the important sides. The other question is, What country or what side involved has the greatest resources to finance this war? And there is where this proposition ought to come home to us. If the allies are going to win this war as the result of having funds with which to finance it, then that necessarily means we must slow down in our expenditures. There is an economical phase of this war situation that does not seem to grip the country at all, and it has not gripped the Congress in any sense whatever. All a man needs to do is to get up here and say we are the richest country in the world, and the appropriation asked for is voted. You can vote $100,000,000 or a billion dollars simply by some man getting up on the floor and saying, "Oh, we are the richest country in the world," and up goes a billion dollars.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A billion dollars?

Mr. HELM. A billion dollars. Just that kind of broad, naked, unsupported statement. Now, my good friend from Missouri is not altogether correct in the statement he made on this floor. The Congress is not altogether to blame for some of the abuses that he referred to. There are no more enterprising men in the United States Government than the heads of some of these bureaus, and I will extend it to some of the heads of the departments, and I will go this far, that if there is not an awakening soon in some of these departments these expenditures are going to go to such an extent that it will be something in the nature of a scandal. If you have ever had one of these bureau chiefs before your committee he wants the utmost dollar that can possibly be put through the committee. He is not overburdened with modesty about his request and his demands. It seems to be a kind of a foot race; more particularly a horse race, and a "2-0" race at that, between them. They all want to have the biggest number of employees in their bureau, and they all want them to have the highest salary, and if they can hear of some other clerk in some other bureau that is getting a little bit more than some clerk in their bureau is getting, they want their clerk to get the highest dollar that any other clerk gets. Now, that is not an exaggerated statement, because I have had some experience in a bill which I have been trying as chairman of a committee to prepare. Instead of there being a feeling on the part of these bureau chiefs that they ought to save and spend this money economically the idea seems to be how much they can spend in the individual bureau. I am for this $10,000,000, and if that is voted down I am going to vote for the $25,000,000 proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could not fix a time to close debate. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I have two minutes of that?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will limit his request to this amendment I will have no objection; but it may be that other amendments might be offered to the section.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want any time on this amendment? That is the only thing—if men keep on offering amendment after amendment here, it might take us all day, and I am trying to close up this bill. If the gentleman wants five minutes, I will agree to that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, depending upon the result of this vote is whether I shall offer an amendment or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose I save the gentleman five minutes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman asks that debate on this amendment be limited, I have no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that debate close on this amendment. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want time on this particular amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; on this particular proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that debate on this amendment close in seven minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have two minutes and I would like to have five.

Mr. CANNON. On the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FOSTER. And the gentleman from Texas—the ten million and twenty-five million.

Mr. CANNON. Both or one?

Mr. FOSTER. They are practically one.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. If I should obtain unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment I offered to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, would that preclude me from reoffering my amendment in the event the amendment of the gentleman from Texas should be voted down?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment and obtains that consent, it would be as if the amendment was never offered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, that is the very question I wanted to speak upon.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has a right to withdraw it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to vote for the $10,000,000 amendment, but if the gentleman does not withdraw the $25,000,000 amendment there may be no opportunity to do it. Is the gentleman going to withdraw the $25,000,000 amendment?

Mr. COX. For the time being, so as to allow the committee to have a direct vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMLIN. My parliamentary inquiry is, Did I understand the Chair to hold that if the gentleman from Indiana withdraws his amendment, and the vote being had, and the proposition of the gentleman from Texas should be adopted, that the gentleman then would have the right to offer his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not propound that inquiry.

Mr. COX. I understood that to be that if the proposition of the gentleman from Texas should be voted down, I would have the right to reoffer my amendment. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] making the amount $25,000,000 instead of $10,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAMLIN to the amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Strike out "$10,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that at the termination of seven minutes debate on the pending amendment shall close. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] one question. At whose suggestion was the amount fixed at $50,000,000?

Mr. FOSTER. It was fixed by the department, by the men who first drew the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What department? The Treasury?

Mr. FOSTER. It was the war-minerals committee and the Bureau of Mines and men connected with the Geological Survey.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that debate close in seven minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the question of the amount was raised during the earlier discussion, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] said then substantially what he says now, except that it appeared then that this $50,000,000 was the suggestion of Mr. Baruch, Mr. Hoover, and of the Secretary of the department, Mr. Lane. But, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] very well and very truthfully says, the tendency in all the departments to-day is to reach out for power and more power, money and more money. The question frequently arises here whether Congress ought not to put a stop to it, whether there should not be an exercise of power here indicating that we do not propose to permit bureau or department chiefs to run this race to mulct the Treasury of the United States.

I want to vote for the $10,000,000 proposition first, because I believe that is enough to experiment with. And that is all we are going to do in this instance. We are going to experiment in prospecting, in the matter of hunting mines and minerals, sending men into the forests and fields, and over arid territory, to find what has already been located by the Geological Survey.

Now, what are we going to do on this proposition? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] offered a substitute for $25,000,000, which would have forced a vote on that first, and given us no opportunity to vote for $10,000,000, but he withdrew it, and instantly the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] renewed it as an amendment to the $10,000,000 amendment, compelling us again to vote for $25,000,000 first. The way to treat this thing, if you want to trent it independently, is to vote down the $25,000,000 amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, and show that you are going to have something to say about this business yourselves as Members of Congress. If you vote it down you will then have an opportunity to vote for the $10,000,000. I believe the $10,000,000 is sufficient to start these prospecting experiments, and this sending of men here, there, and yonder to find something new for the department to do. There is no politics in this suggestion. It is a business proposition on which Congress should exercise its own judgment. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania evidently does not understand the bill or does not know what he is talking about. He says that this $10,000,000 is for an experimentation, for sending men out to explore the forests, and explore hither and thither, in order to locate these minerals. Now, that is not the fact at all. This $50,000,000 as provided in this bill is for the working capital of this organization. Now, I do not know—nobody else knows—just the amount that it will take. This goes before the Appropriations Committee, and they will look up the subject and determine what amount, as best they can, ought to be appropriated. When the affairs of this organization shall be wound up, when the war closes, every dollar, in all probability, of this money will be returned to the Treasury. There may be a little less or there may be a little more than the original amount. But it is not to be fooled away, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says. It is simply the working capital of this organization.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman refer to section 12, where you provide going out into territory——

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman does not know the bill and does not know what is wanted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman's attention to section 12.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman does not know just what is in the bill or he would not have made the statement on the floor of the House that this was for the purpose of going out and exploring mines, because the bill expressly provides that none of this money can be used except for the purpose I have mentioned. Now, that is a fact. My good friend friend from Pennsylvania is usually right, but in this case he is wrong.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I recur to section 12.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman has not read it and does not know.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this appropriation provides storage facilities and purchase of necessaries, if it shall become necessary, and to sell them again, so as to make this revolving fund needed here. I do not know what amount will be necessary. Nobody on earth can tell the exact amount that will be necessary. These men placed it at $50,000,000 when they considered what might happen to be done under this bill. It may happen to be much more. They may come back to Congress and say that $50,000,000 is not sufficient to carry out the purposes of this act. I realize that Congress does not like to make these large appropriations. And I have done this: When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] offered his amendment to cut this to $25,000,000 I had not any serious objection to it, and I do not have now. I think it is all right if we do that, because I believe if it is necessary to secure another appropriation, and they can show they have rightly expended this money, Congress will make the appropriation.

Now, I ask you in all fairness, gentlemen, not to vote for a $10,000,000 proposition. It is not sufficient money. It is not sufficient to go out and do this work, and I ask you not to do that. I am sincere about it, as sincere as I can be.

I want to impress upon you the importance of carrying out the purposes of this act and securing this material, if it shall be necessary; and if you make it $25,000,000 and it should be necessary to secure more money, I believe the Committee on Appropriations, with the approval of Congress, would make that appropriation. But I do most earnestly hope, gentlemen, that you will not vote for this amendment. It is not enough. Any man can go over this proposition and see that we could not secure enough of these things to get along with $10,000,000.

This money is not to be thrown away. It is simply the working capital of this organization, and it will go back to the Treasury again; but there may be times when it will require much more than $10,000,000, or much more than $25,000,000, to carry on this work. The money is not to be squandered. If it were, you should hesitate with reference to it. So I hope that this $10,000,000 will not be voted, but that the one making it $25,000,000 will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

Mr. CANNON. Is this the $25,000,000 proposition?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; the $25,000,000 proposition.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 41.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. HAMLIN and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 55.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes up on the $10,000,000 proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, may I move to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been exhausted on this paragraph by agreement. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 34.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That employment under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any person from military service under the provisions of the selective-draft law approved May 18, 1917.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak on the subject of ferromanganese, a subject not mentioned in the pending paragraph. I desire to proceed for not more than five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes on the subject of ferromanganese. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, as I have read this bill and looked over the report of the hearings and heard the arguments advanced in the debate, especially some of the statements concerning ferromanganese, I was reminded of the debate here in 1913 on the Underwood tariff bill, and of a dialogue I then had with a gentleman, a very distinguished Member of the House from Pennsylvania, now occupying a high position in the executive department of the Government, the Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer. Mr. Palmer was making a speech, he then being a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. This dialogue may perhaps reveal to gentlemen the importance of the bill now before us, and the good judgment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] when he declared a few minutes ago that $10,000,000 would not suffice to accomplish the bill's legitimate purposes. I agreed with the gentleman from Illinois and voted for the $25,000,000 amendment.

Here is the dialogue with Mr. Palmer:

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. PALMER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Does the Steel Trust make all the ferromanganese it uses? I understand it does.

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

They were proposing a tariff on ferromanganese.

Mr. COOPER. Then the trust would pay no tariff on ferromanganese, but the independent iron manufacturer would.

Mr. PALMER. I have said that.

Mr. COOPER. I did not hear the gentleman say it.

Mr. PALMER. I said exactly that, that there is no ferromanganese made in this country for sale. The steel and iron corporation makes ferromanganese for its own use, and all other producers of steel and iron buy ferromanganese from abroad.

That statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the home of the Steel Trust, may enlighten gentlemen as to the wisdom of enacting the pending bill into law. For if we can not import from other countries because of lack of shipping, then, of course, it becomes of paramount importance that we shall make ferromanganese in this country in sufficient quantities to meet the needs of manufacturers and of the Government, for, as we are informed, the Steel Trust, the vast producer and user of steel and iron, makes its own ferromanganese, and does not sell any of it, and all other producers of steel and iron must import ferromanganese.

Then the dialogue with Mr. Palmer continued:

When the Payne law was written they had ferromanganese at even a higher rate than this.

Mr. COOPER. Then, if the gentleman will permit an interruption——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PALMER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. If the Steel Trust makes its own ferromanganese and does not import any, and all the other manufacturers, the little fellows, do import it, the Steel Trust will not pay this duty, but the small manufacturers will. Will not that be the situation?

Mr. PALMER. Well, we can not write a law that will make everybody pay a duty at the customhouse.

Mr. COOPER. But we are expected to write a law that will not discriminate in favor of the trust and against the independent producers.

I invite particular attention, Mr. Chairman, to that dialogue, and especially to the statement of Mr. Palmer, that the Steel Trust—by far the greatest in the world—makes its own ferromanganese and sells none, and that the small men have to import it.

Ferromanganese is absolutely necessary in the manufacture of steel. But if shipping is interfered with and imports prevented, it necessarily follows that we should at once do something to help supply ferromanganese, or the materials to make it, for the small man. This argument makes clear why I voted for $25,000,000 instead of $10,000,000, which, in my judgment, is an amount altogether insufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. The United States Steel Corporation, I am informed, produces 60 per cent of the steel and iron in the United States. So, according to the gentleman's statement, it makes six-tenths of the ferromanganese. I do not believe it makes that much. That is all I want to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will kindly permit me, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that I quoted what Mr. Palmer, a recognized expert, and one of the country's leading Democrats, said in 1913 in open debate on this floor during the consideration of the Underwood tariff bill.

Here are his words:

There is no ferromanganese made in this country for sale. The steel and iron corporation makes ferromanganese for its own use, and all other producers of steel and iron buy ferromanganese from abroad.

By the words "steel and iron corporation" he means what we call the Steel Trust.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow me, I will say that, notwithstanding the high admiration I have for the beauty and the intellect of our former colleague, Mr. Palmer, I feel quite sure that he was not very reliably informed when he made that statement while the Underwood tariff bill was being framed here from a free-trade standpoint. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield now?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman refresh the recollection of Members as to who the Mr. Palmer is who made this interesting statement? Is that the same Mr. Palmer who was a Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A leader of the Democracy of Pennsylvania?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And now the Alien Property Custodian of the United States by appointment of President Wilson?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am glad that, at last, I have convinced the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the identity of this Mr. Palmer. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That the President shall cause a detailed report to be made to the Congress on the 1st day of January each year of all proceedings had under this act during the year preceding. Such report shall, in addition to other matters, contain an account of all persons appointed or employed, the salary or compensation paid or allowed each, the aggregate amount of the different kinds of property purchased or requisitioned, the use and disposition made of such property, and a statement of all receipts, payments, and expenditures, together with a statement showing the general character and estimated value of all property then on hand and the aggregate amount and character of all claims against the United States growing out of this act.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SISSON: Amend, on page 19, line 8, by striking out, after the word "day," the words "of January each year" and inserting the words "of each regular session."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to make a detailed explanation of the reason for offering this amendment. Congress meets in December, and all reports of this character are always transmitted on or before the first day of the session.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is right, and I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if I may be granted just a word further on this manganese question, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], entirely unintentionally, gave the House a somewhat wrong impression as to the conditions that prevailed at the time of the passage of the Underwood bill. Under the Payne law there was a tariff of $2.50 a ton on ferromanganese, but manganese ore was free from duty. Ferromanganese ore came into this country in large quantities and was smelted by the United States Steel Corporation. Consequently it made, through its smelters, nearly all the ferromanganese in the country, and it would not have made any difference with that situation whether the tariff was on or off. The Steel Corporation would still have done the smelting, because it was the only concern having smelters to carry on that manufacture. Now, unless I misunderstand the purpose of the bill, vast and extensive as are its powers, it is not intended at this time that the United States Government will go into the business of smelting manganese ore, although in one section power is given to take over undeveloped smelters. So the Steel Corporation will still go on making nearly all the ferromanganese that is made in this country unless the Government not only takes the undeveloped smelters, but the developed smelters of the Steel Trust or builds smelters itself and operates them. I do not find any power to do either in the bill. Apparently, these powers were overlooked, or they would have been put in the bill by the bureau chiefs who framed it. In any event, there is nothing in the bill that will tend to relieve the bill from the exactions of the Steel Trust, and if there was it would require no great amount of money as long as the Government does not go into the business itself and only uses the funds for the purpose of stimulating the industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That words used in this act shall be construed to import the plural or the singular, as the case demands. The word "person" wherever used in this act shall include individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure, of any official, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any partnership, association, or corporation within the scope of his employment or office shall, in every case, also be deemed the act, omission, or failure of such partnership, association, or corporation as well as that of the person.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word

In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], I have only this to say: Manufacturers of prominence in my section of the country—and there are some great manufacturers of agricultural implements—complain of the very high prices of steel. They consider some of these prices as extortionate. Of course, as an inevitable consequence of the high price of steel the farmers pay a correspondingly high price for the implements necessary to cultivate the farms and produce the food for the people and the soldiers. Remembering these facts, and looking through this bill, I have thought that back of it, possibly, was a purpose to devise a means by which certain things absolutely essential to the production of steel and other war necessaries should be made more plentiful and available than they are to-day, and thus perhaps help to protect manufacturers and the Government from being held up.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will my friend from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is now imported annually only about $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 worth of manganese and manganese ore, the greater portion of which is taken by the Steel Trust, so that I do not see the necessity of a very great amount of money for that purpose.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose that as a result of the enactment of this bill into law there should be developed in this country great quantities of manganese, and that out of that ore there should be manufactured great quantities of ferromanganese. Inevitably it would give the smaller men a better chance than they have to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect after the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President, as soon as in his judgment the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated; but the termination of this act shall not affect any act done, or any right or obligation accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil case before the said termination pursuant to this act; but all rights and liabilities under this act arising before its termination shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if the act had not terminated. Any offense committed and all penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred prior to such termination may be prosecuted or punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been terminated.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, line 14, after the number "22," strike out down to and including the word "act," in line 20, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect at the end of six months after the existing state of war between the United States and Germany and between the United States and Austria-Hungary, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the termination of this act shall not affect the exercise of such authority and power herein granted as shall be necessary to speedily wind up the affairs of any enterprise already entered upon or to carry out any guaranty or contract pursuant to the terms thereof, and such termination."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was agreed to as a part of the bill, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana who introduced this amendment, which I understand is accepted by the gentleman from Illinois, whether there is any limitation whatever as to the acts done by the department or any agency thereof during the period of the war?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. A specific limitation upon any contract is contained in the provision that no contracts will be entered into after the termination of the war. There is also a specific provision that there shall be no guaranty for a greater period than two years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to state what is in my mind in regard to this amendment and this section? In the war-corporation bill it was provided that all business should terminate in a period of 10 years. That was the substance of the provision. There must be an end of the contract; there must be a limitation somewhere. You propose by your amendment now to have this mining business quit six months after the war rather than immediately after the war, as the section recites. During the pendency of the war, however, contracts may be made for a longer period, unless I am misinformed. I want to find out whether the committee has put a limitation upon the department for such business as originates during the pendency of the war.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will pardon me, section 11 provides that contracts shall not be for a longer term than two years.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think I have in mind the point of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the business thus created during the war may run on indefinitely unless some limitation is fixed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the provision mentioned by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] cover that, the provision in section 11?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Here is the provision in section 11, page 10:

That the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is authorized from time to time to use the funds provided under section 18 to enter into contracts for necessaries for periods of not exceeding two years, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell necessaries at reasonable prices to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President.

There is a specific limitation on contracts for necessaries. I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania has in mind the entering into some sort of agreement where, for instance, they take over an idle plant.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; for in section 2 the President is "authorized to enter into any voluntary arrangement or agreements." Under that he might do anything under the sun.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is no specific limitation on the exercise of any of these powers which might extend for a period of time, except the specific provision in section 11. However, I think the provision in the amendment I have offered——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is an after-the-war proposition. The damage may be done during the pendency of the war.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In the event that the executive department should undertake to carry this on permanently—for instance, in the taking over of an idle mine—all of that could be reached, if there was an abuse of the spirit of the law, by a subsequent Congress which will have the power to repeal or amend.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will discuss this matter, I will be satisfied. I do not know whether we can correct it now, in view of the state of mind the House is in, but I want to call attention to it, because I hope that in another body there will be some limitation over and above what appears to be the limit in this bill, so that a department or a bureau can not make contracts during the pendency of the war that will run on forever.

Mr. FOSTER. We do not intend to do that.

Mr. ANDERSON. By the very terms of the bill those contracts could only be for the period of the war, because the bill applies only during the period of the war, and, under the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], for six months thereafter, except for the purpose of closing up any enterprise which may have been entered on, and except for the purpose of suits arising out of rights acquired during the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course you are providing now, and that is proper, that no contracts shall be entered into after the war. That stops business from that point of view; but in section 23, the last section of the bill, it is provided, from line 20, that while the business is to cease after the war "the termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued" during the pendency of the war. During the pendency of the war you have the right to do anything under the sun, and you may make an arrangement or obligation to run as long as you please. I say there ought to be some limitation as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the committee automatically rises under the rule.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11259 and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. GARLAND. To make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania opposed to the bill?

Mr. GARLAND. I am for the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there anybody here opposed to the bill who wants to offer a motion to recommit? If so, the Chair will recognize him; if not, he will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARLAND moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Mines and Mining, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following instructions: Strike out, after the word "empowered," in line 18, page 16, the words "to fix the prices of necessaries wherever and whenever sold either by producer or dealer."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to correct the motion. It should be "amendment" instead of "instructions."

Mr. CANNON. I hope it may be read again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARLAND moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Mines and Mining, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out, after the word "empowered," in line 18, page 16, the words "to fix the prices of necessaries wherever and whenever sold either by producer or dealer."

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 57.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 156, nays 150, answered "present" 4, not voting 120, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Clerk may renumber the sections. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. BURNETT, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, presented for printing, under the rule, the conference report on the bill (H. R. 3132) to amend section 2171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to naturalization.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the conference report on the bill H. R. 8696, the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to recommit to the conferees the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Speaker has examined the precedents and made up his mind that the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is in order, I do not wish to discuss the question. Of course, the motion made by the gentleman from Oklahoma establishes, in a way, a precedent in this House. There are rulings by former Speakers that hold that under conditions similar to the situation presented in this case no motion to recommit is necessary; that the printing of the conference report by the gentleman from Oklahoma in the RECORD, when this House did not have possession of the papers, was without any authority whatsoever.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Was informal.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was irregular and should be disregarded completely. I realize that we are establishing a ruling here that will apply in the future many, many times, not only in this body but in the other body. For instance, a conference report is brought into this House; a point of order is made against it; we have the papers and it is considered. The Speaker sustains the point of order that the conferees exceeded their authority. In the other body no action has been taken on the conference report.

It has not even been presented, because, Mr. Speaker, while it is frequently the practice that conferees present for printing in the RECORD conference reports without the possession of the papers, the conference report has no right to be presented formally for consideration until the conferees are in possession of the papers.

In this case the Senate agreed to the conference and the papers were in the possession of the Senate conferees. When the report was presented to the Senate for action a point of order was made. It is immaterial what was the reason for the Senate recommitting the bill, whether it was in consonance with some rule which was adopted by that body, which provides that no legislation can be added to any amendment by the conferees, or whether it was recommitted on formal vote. If the gentleman from Oklahoma had not presented the conference report for printing in the RECORD, this House would not have been advised whatsoever of the action of the Senate, except informally. The conferees would still be in existence, because they had not presented their report, and they would naturally go back into conference without any action whatever on the part of the House.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is assuming, I think, that the Senate followed out the correct procedure, which it did not do. The situation, Mr. Speaker, is just about this: The Senate has a rule that provides that when a point of order is sustained against a conference report, such report is automatically recommitted to conference. That rule was invoked against this conference report, but when the Senate notified the House of that action, it messaged the papers in connection with the bill along over to the House, and the original papers in connection with the matter are now on the Speaker's desk. I have asked unanimous consent to take them down so that we might get back into conference, but that has been refused by the House, so I know of no way by which the papers can go off the Speaker's desk now except by some action of the House itself. Therefore I have made this motion to bring the matter to the issue of the necessary procedure.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's unanimous-consent request was to withdraw the conference report which he had previously presented.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The papers were with the conference report. Now, I know of no other way to get at this, Mr. Speaker, so far as the House is concerned. It might be that the Senate could pass a resolution requesting the return of the papers to the Senate, and in that way conform to the procedure as it has been in the past and as it was supposed to be by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I made no request. I moved to recommit the bill to conference.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that one of two things ought to be done, in view of the rules of the Senate. When we remember the condition of affairs at the close of the session, when time is of the utmost importance, we realize what difficulty we would have if this procedure should have to be gone through with and a point of order should be sustained, as it was in this instance in the Senate. Either the rules of the House ought to be amended so that this bill could automatically go back to conference or else the Chair ought to make a ruling that would send the bill automatically back to conference without any motion.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the Senate had retained possession of the papers, as is the practice when sending a bill back to conference, then the bill would have gone back to conference automatically; but when they sent their message to the House, after the conference report had been recommitted, it seems they made the mistake of sending the papers along with the report, and the papers are now on the Speaker's table, unavailable to the conferees except by permission of the House. The House managers have not been discharged. All precedents hold the conference committee to be still in existence. The committee is not functus officio; it could function if it only had possession of the papers. Now, the only thing necessary to be done to unscramble the eggs and the only thing the conferees or the House should concern itself about is in transferring legal possession of the original papers in the case from the House to the House conferees. Since we have failed to get unanimous consent I know of no way that can be done if such a motion as this is ruled out of order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, in this connection let me direct the attention of the Chair to one other point. Is there a conference committee existing on the part of the House pertaining to this Indian bill? If the Chair holds that it is necessary for the House by a motion to send the bill back to conference, is it not further necessary for the Chair to appoint conferees again? And would not the House have the right under the rules to select the conferees if it desired to do so—to change the conferees? The Speaker or even the House would have the right to change the conferees, naming different conferees than those that formerly existed on this bill. So I suggest to the Chair that one of two things ought to be done. Either the rules ought to be amended so that this bill would go back to conference automatically with the same conferees, or else the Speaker ought to hold, in order to facilitate matters, that it does not go back automatically to those same conferees, because we would naturally have to select new conferees if the Chair held that it was necessary to send it back to conference. If there is no conference, there are no conferees, and therefore in sending it back to conference the Chair would have to reappoint the conferees.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not contend that we ought to permit another body to make rules for us, does he?

Mr. GARNER. Oh, no; but I do contend, Mr. Speaker, that our rules ought to contain whatever is necessary to facilitate the action of this House in connection with the action of another body.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, so far as I have been able to determine from precedents, the Senate was clearly within its right when it recommitted this conference report. It has been ruled time and again that either House has a right to recommit a conference report, provided either House has not taken such action as would discharge its conferees. That was ruled once in a controversy over this very same bill.

In the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress the Senate recommitted the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, and the point of order made against that motion was overruled by the Vice President. The House procedure in that case, to a certain point, was somewhat similar to this. The House seemed to have filed its conference report informally before the Senate took the action of recommitting. After the Senate recommitted, the conferees went back into session, taking up the Senate amendments de novo. When the report had been completed, one of the House managers presented the report for printing under the rules. The point of order was made that a report had already been filed and not disposed of. The Chair overruled the point of order on the ground that the filing of the report by the House conferees did not contain the original papers and was therefore informal.

The difference between that case and this seems to be only this: When the Senate messaged their action to the House on the former case the papers did not accompany the message, and the Chair seems to have held on that occasion that the bill went back to conference automatically. Undoubtedly that would apply to this situation but for the fact that when the Senate messaged this action of recommittal over to the House this time it sent along with the message the original papers in the case, thereby placing them on the Speaker's desk.

What action has been taken in the House to discharge its conferees? No action whatever has been taken by the House except the mere informal filing of the report for printing. The filing of the report, even if formal and accompanied by the papers, is not a disposal of the report. It does not even constitute consideration of the report, so there can be no doubt about the present existence of the conference committee so far as the House conferees are concerned.

Mr. GARNER. If the conferees exist now, why is it necessary for the House to take any action at all?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. On account of the mistake made by the Senate in messaging the original papers from the Senate to the House, the papers being on the Speaker's desk and the conferees being unable to get them without some action by the House.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. But if the same point of order had been made in the House as was made in the Senate—and, of course, it might have been—that would have amounted here to a rejection of the conference report, would it not?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; that would have been the effect.

Mr. GILLETT. Ought we to allow the conference report to be rejected here by a point of order, while in the Senate the conference report is sent back to the conferees by a point of order?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. When there are none in existence?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. But the conferees are in existence now.

Mr. GILLETT. But if anybody should make the point of order here against that conference report it would have to be sustained, and this conference report would be rejected, and therefore there would not be any conferees.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; but the Senate rules differ from the rules of the House in that respect. The Senate rule provides that the sustaining of a point of order against a conference report automatically recommits the measure to conference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But to whom?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. You can move to recommit the conference report in the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To whom?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. To the conference committee, provided the conferees have not been discharged.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Provided there is a conference committee in existence.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; provided the conferees are in existence, it is competent to move to recommit the conference report in the House or in the Senate.

Mr. GILLETT. But we do not want this question to come up on every conference report.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GILLETT. It seems to me we had better settle it one way or the other.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I want to settle it now, and that is the purpose of my motion.

Mr. GILLETT. But it does not seem to me this is a good way to settle it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, of course the Senate rules can not operate further than upon the Members of its own body or upon its own agents, or functionaries. But the mere fact that the Senate has made a rule which operates of its own force to have the effect of a recommittal is no reason why the House should raise a controversy with that body over that particular rule, so long as it does not operate to our prejudice, or disadvantage. The fact that the rules of the Senate provide that a ruling sustaining a point of order to a conference report shall have the same effect as a motion recommitting the report is nothing that concerns us. Of course it would be competent under the rules of the Senate to make a formal motion to recommit a report to the conferees, so long as there was a joint conference committee to which that report could be recommitted. The sole question that interests us is, whether there is such a conference committee. That inquiry can be answered by an appeal to our own procedure, and our own records.

Has this House taken any action which has operated to discharge our members of the conference committee? If so, what is it? As I understand, from the facts stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma the action that has been taken is by no means sufficient to effect such a discharge. It seems that as a result of some informality, the papers are here, when as a matter of fact, they should be in the Senate. That being so the gentleman from Oklahoma asks that these papers be remitted to the conference committee which is still in existence, inasmuch as no action in either body has operated to discharge it. If it is contended that the conference committee of the House has been discharged by any action that we have taken, then I ask again what is that action? That is the one inquiry to which we should direct our attention. Of course I repudiate any suggestion that the Senate by the operation of its own rules can control our procedure, or the joint procedure, or in any way impinge on the rights of the House. I would resent any effort to that end by the Senate in the most emphatic manner. But it is certainly competent for the Senate to recommit a report to a conference committee still in being. No objection to that action on their part could be raised in this body. It seems to me the report heretofore made by the gentleman from Oklahoma is merely an informal report in the absence of the possession on his part of the papers. This report is insufficient to discharge our conferees, no action on the same having been taken. This informal action should not be treated as more than such, and if so regarded, then it is not that action which is considered necessary to discharge a committee of conference. But if our conference committee is still in existence, then the action of the Senate recommitting the report has not impinged in any wise upon our authority or dignity. It is a matter of no concern to us whether the recommittal in the Senate was effected by a point of order, or a formal motion.

It seems to me that the simplest way to deal with this situation would be for the gentleman from Oklahoma on behalf of his committee to ask unanimous consent to withdraw the papers now in our possession, for the purpose of further conference with the Senate committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, for the reasons stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], the conference report is still in existence. No action whatever has been taken by the House that would discharge the House conferees. No action has been taken by the Senate to discharge its conferees. Therefore the conferees on the Indian appropriation bill are still in existence. By an irregularity the House conferees submitted a conference report under the rule when they, as a matter of fact, did not have the papers.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman knows, of course, that that is the usual procedure.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I know it is generally done; and no notice would have been taken of this, and no embarrassment would have occurred, if it had not been for the subsequent proceedings in the Senate; that report having been filed gave notice to the House, as far as the House was concerned, that the conferees had come to a decision upon a distinct agreement with the Senate. But subsequently the Senate disposed of the action of the conferees in a summary way, and instead of sending the papers back to conference, as they should have done, they messaged the papers over to the House, where they did not belong, and they are now on the Speaker's desk. It seems to me that the proper way to dispose of them is by unanimous consent or by a motion, made by the gentleman from Oklahoma, to refer the papers where they properly belong—to the committee of conference—just as an erroneous reference of a bill to a committee may on motion be properly referred to the committee to which it properly belongs.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the real point of controversy is whether there is in existence a conference committee on the part of the two Houses. If the Senate instead of rejecting the report of the conference committee, by virtue of a point of order made and sustained, had rejected the report by a direct vote, by which they simply turned down the conference, I assume it would not be contended that the conference committee was still in existence. Now, the same effect seems to follow when they reject a conference report on a point of order, and it seems to me that what the House ought to do is to agree that the papers shall be taken from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, agree to a conference, and appoint conferees, just as if the old conference committee were dead forever, and I think it is.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. But the Senate has not requested a conference.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then we should request a conference.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. What the gentleman from Kentucky says would be correct if the conference report had been rejected by the Senate on motion to that effect, but that is what the Senate did not do. A point of order was sustained against the report, and the new Senate rule provides that this specific action automatically recommits the matter under consideration to conference.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the whole matter. The rule is what made the whole issue. It does not seem to me that a House has a right to reject a report——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We do the same thing here.

Mr. SHERLEY. What the House does is to reject the report and then it goes into a new conference.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The House often recommits a conference report to the conference committee. It took such action last summer on the conscription bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not reject it and then recommit it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The difficulty we got into arose when the Senate recommitted the bill to the committee of conference, and they messaged the news over here by the usual resolution, which would have been all right if they had not also sent the papers. But, while we have the physical possession of the papers, the Chair doubts very much whether we have them in the right way. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] cites a decision. The Chair has examined all these decisions, but they are not like the present case, because we have the physical possession of these papers. The Chair does not think the conference committee is dead. The Senate specifically referred it to the conferees.

If the committee of conference is alive, the only question is how to get these papers out of this House back to that conference committee, and the Chair thinks that the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is in order.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to prefer a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. When do the conferees cease—on the report of the committee here or upon the action of the House?

The SPEAKER. On the action of the House.

Mr. FESS. And if the action is negative, would it be the same as in an affirmative action?

The SPEAKER. If it is an affirmative action, they go out of existence automatically.

Mr. FESS. And a negative action?

The SPEAKER. If the House takes a negative action, they go out, too.

Mr. FESS. That is the question I had in mind.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If the House was not in possession of these papers, then the Speaker would hold that the conferees continued their work as though no action had been had?

The SPEAKER. Of course. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to take the bill H. R. 8696, the Indian appropriation bill, from the Speaker's table and rerefer it to the conferees. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WHITE of Maine for the balance of this week, on account of urgent personal business.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11692, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and pending that motion I would ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] if we can not agree upon time for general debate. I would like to have that time just as short as we can have it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I have investigated upon this side of the Chamber, and, while I am as anxious, perhaps more so, as the gentleman from Mississippi to get this cut short so that we can get down to the merits of what I consider a very good bill, yet I do not see how we can get along on this side with less than three hours.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state, if he has not done so, why three hours of general debate is requested on this bill, and further, whether it is to be debate confined to the bill itself or something that has no relation to it?

Mr. DAVIS. This is general debate, and the information that has come to me quite freely is that during the passage of the naval appropriation bill gentlemen did not have any opportunity for general debate at all, and they are trying, as it were, to unload the general debate upon that bill onto this bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I have this information, that some requests for time were made on the naval appropriation bill, and gentlemen who made those requests were asked to defer them and ask for time on this bill or some other bill, which was done under that sort of agreement with the leaders, because of the importance of getting the naval bill through.

Mr. DAVIS. I was stating the substance of the matter just as though the whole House had talked about it instead of the leaders.

Mr. SISSON. That information coming to me causes me to be a little more liberal in any agreement that I would make now. Would five hours in all be satisfactory to the gentleman? I do not think there would be more than two hours consumed on this side, and I will try to give the gentleman 30 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. If the gentleman will do that, it will be perfectly satisfactory to me, and when I say that I mean the Members on this side of the House who desire to talk.

Mr. SISSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, pending the motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to five hours, three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and two hours by myself.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To be confined to the bill?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. SISSON. I understand they do not want the debate confined to the bill. I would like to have it confined to the bill; but in doing that there will be nothing to talk about, because these gentlemen do not care to talk about the District appropriation bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be limited to five hours, three hours of which are to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and two by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. And to that the gentleman from Tennessee makes the addendum that the debate be confined to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I object to that. I can not agree to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District appropriation bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASTINGS. If this motion is agreed to and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the District appropriation bill, then under the rules of the House will gentlemen be confined to a discussion of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with the Committee of the Whole, but gives it as his own opinion that they would not. The question is on going into Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District appropriation bill, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 11692, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill to the House for its consideration I deem it proper first that a short general statement be made outlining the general policy adopted by the subcommittee which made up this bill. The original estimates called for nearly $5,000,000 more than is carried in this bill.

Wherever the program of the District Commissioners called for an expenditure of large sums of money in an extensive building program your committee denied the appropriation. The building program called for a million and three-quarter dollars for additions to schools alone. We called upon the District Commissioners and the board of education to state to your committee whether or not they believed that the building program could be carried out under present war conditions.

After quite a good deal of discussion it was agreed that the wisest thing to do would be to take care of the increase of children in the schools of the various sections by building portable school buildings. Your committee felt that it would be unwise to try to enter upon an extensive building program at this time. I will give you just one illustration of what we were up against. Three years ago an eight-room addition was proposed to one of the school buildings in the city and they asked for $75,000. The committee gave the $75,000. In the meantime the European war had broken out. When the time arrived they advertised for bids. The advertisements were made in accordance with the law, and the smallest bid they got was $85,000. In last year's appropriation there was carried an appropriation of $87,500—a leeway of $2,500. They advertised for bids and the cheapest bid they got on the same building was $141,000. The District Commissioners, of course, could not accept the bid because it was far in excess of the appropriation. The engineer commissioner said that unless the contracts were let at these enormous and criminal figures it would be utterly impossible to get the building done. Even then it is very doubtful whether or not it could be built on time, for it is doubtful if the building material could be had for this purpose at all.

The greater reason we had in our minds for not entering upon the building program at this time was that it would be an increased demand upon this labor market. The demand now is far beyond the supply. It is absolutely impossible for the activities of the Government to get the labor essential to carrying on the war activities except with great difficulty.

Another reason was that this building program would necessitate contractors bringing quite a number of laborers into the District of Columbia, where the housing facilities are taxed beyond the capacity of the District already. The committee was absolutely harmonious on this proposition.

Mr. Chairman, I will take this opportunity to say that the entire subcommittee that made up this bill were a unit on the proposition that everything should be done with an eye single to winning this war; that wherever the activities in civil life interfered with the proper prosecution of the war it was our duty to let the activities of civil life remain in abeyance until this war is won. At this time the efforts of all the American people should be turned to the one great object of our lives, and that is the proper prosecution of the war, because the very life of the Nation and the very liberties we have always held dearer than life are involved in this great struggle.

Mr. Chairman, it is also my privilege to state that during our deliberations it would have been impossible to have told who was a Democrat or who was a Republican because we were dealing with nonpartisan questions entirely in this bill. Each member of the committee was willing that where a civil activity interfered with a military necessity, we, without a dissenting vote, made the civil activity wait.

This is a momentous day in the history of the world. In making up this bill your committee never for one moment forgot the all-important question, "America must win the war." Since war was declared, as a member of this great committee, I have never permitted anything to prevent my making this the paramount question. Some have said that America should not have entered this war. While I differ with them, I will not now quarrel with them if they will now say that since we are in I am now with my country and we must win. If he will say my all is now upon the altar of my country and we must all pay, fight, and die, if need be, as one man for America and American ideals and to save our own liberty and the liberty of the world, I will forget his former position.

Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the Members I may state here my position in reference to our duty as Members of Congress toward the war. I think it proper at this time to state my position, so that if you should see something needed to be done here in the District that is not done in this bill, your committee I think to a man will be in accord with me when I say that we left it undone because we would not do anything that would impede or interfere with our war program.

These are times that try men's souls and offer opportunities for service and heroism never before offered to a people in any age of the world's history. Opportunity for the greatest sacrifice is offered to us all in this favored land. No American can excuse himself from some kind of service. If he can not fight, he can pay; if he can not pay, he can labor; if he can neither labor or pay, he can pray. He can use his influence. He can help unify American sentiment. He can help arouse America to the proper sense of our danger, and this is a great service.

So I say every one in America can do something now for his country. Let us stop criticizing and confer with each other. Let us be tolerant with the opinion of others and be not too quick to question the other man's motive. He may be right. Let us all in the proper spirit, from the President down, try to prevent mistakes. Do not hesitate to call attention to dangers which we see, but do so in a true American spirit. If mistakes have been made, do not condemn, if the mistake was an honest one and there was no perfidy in it. Whatever a man's past opinion has been before the declaration of war, let us forget that, provided he is right now. I am not interested in an American's former attitude. What I am interested in is where do you stand now. Are you 100 per cent American now? Will you fight now? Will you pay now? Will you help now?

Every man in the South loves Robert E. Lee. But when the Civil War broke out Lee was not in accord with secession. What if he had been condemned on that ground? The South would have lost its greatest commander. No man will now say that Lee did not do his duty. So I say to all Americans who thought we should not have gone into this war I will not condemn you. I forget his former position if he is right now and stays right to the end. Those of us who are denied the high privilege of going to the front can show that we are right now, not by words but by acts and deeds. At the present moment every man can do the task we now have on hand. The most important present task is to raise the money for the third liberty loan. Do it now. I will never question the young boy's patriotism who goes to France and gives his young life fighting bravely the battles of liberty for America solely because before we got into the struggle this boy thought we should not go into the fight. Nor will I question the patriotism of the man who now gives his money and his boy and is willing to give his life for the cause solely because he differed with me about going into this war. Look over America to-day. How many, many men were opposed to our going into the war but are now doing their full duty by their country and are now in the forefront of the battle, even though denied the honor of going into the fighting line.

The Capital City can not afford to be a slacker city in any line. Every officer and employee of the Government has an opportunity to show the Nation and the world by their example what the real spirit of the Nation is. Buy bonds to the limit of your ability. More than that, become more efficient in your work than ever before. Do not complain if the task assigned is hard. Perform it and do it well. If it takes overtime, do it and be thankful for the opportunity to serve your Government in this hour of peril. Think of the service the noble boys in the ranks are compelled to perform in sunshine, in cold, and in rain. Keep that picture in your mind and the task at your desk will seem light.

Let the American spirit of 1775 be the spirit of 1918. Let the battle cry of Patrick Henry, uttered in old St. John's Episcopal Church, at Richmond, Va., where the Virginia convention was held, be America's cry to-day. When men were doubtful and wavering this patriot's words, "I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death," went quivering and shivering along the veins and arteries of all patriots from Maine to Georgia. Young America buckled on the sword and shouldered the musket for human liberty.

It was 143 years ago this month, on that beautiful spring morning of April, 1775, when the Minute Men at Lexington were fired upon. That was the shot which "was heard round the world." The same sacred cause is calling us. The same cause for which Patrick Henry spoke the inspired words in old St. John's Church is the same cause for which I speak now. Little did Maj. Pitcairn dream when he ordered his soldiers to fire that shot at Lexington that he had released an irresistible and unconquerable force which started a chain of events which is now culminating in the world strife of to-day. Its echoes aroused the Green Mountain boys—caused Putnam to leave the plow in the furrow. Patrick Henry gave voice to the true American sentiment in every liberty-loving heart, and called the patriots of Virginia and the Carolinas, yea, the patriots of all the South, and with the patriots of all the North as brethren in the great struggle for liberty, which continued until the Declaration of Independence became an established fact and America became a land of free men.

Again, in 1812, the same sentiment aroused our people to a new and broader defense of our liberties and freedom, and the victory of American patriots under Andrew Jackson at New Orleans gave America and all nations the right to sail the seas.

The same spirit caused the promulgation of the Monroe doctrine, which was a declaration of independence for all the Western Hemisphere. It was this same spirit which found its way along the Sierras of Mexico and gave her the power to end the long-continued misrule of Spain. It was this same spirit that caused the same battle cry to reverberate up and down the length of the Andes and over the llanos and pampas of South America, and called our brethren of South America to struggle for freedom, until under the leadership of Simon Bolivar the last shackles of slavery were stricken off and the colonies of the Spanish grandees became free nations. Oceans were no barriers to this sentiment of freedom, for it leaped the turbulent waters of the Atlantic, and the people of Europe admit the benefits of the American Revolution. In England, France, Italy, Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden they revere the name of Washington, and the Fourth of July is with them a sacred day. Yea, France filled with this sentiment found in America her example, and in her struggle for freedom found the new inspiration in this example and has become one of the freest people on earth. Yea, the downtrodden and oppressed people of all nations are longing for the same freedom for themselves.

But to-day the issue is not that of one nation struggling to be free. This is a world struggle for freedom. The forces of darkness and hate have ranged themselves under the banner of autocracy and for the subjugation of the world. They are being met by the hosts of free nations who will never, in my judgment, cease the conflict until the American idea of liberty is crowned with victory and men everywhere have the right to be at peace with the rest of mankind and among themselves.

This great American idea of liberty and freedom is not confined to martial affairs and the roar of cannon and machine guns. Every struggle for the betterment of humanity is but a continuation of the battle for the rights of man. The right to be free; the right of every man to feel that he is a sovereign and to obey only the dictates of his own conscience and laws that define the civic rights of all with no special discrimination or favors to the strong; the right to free and popular education; the right of complete and absolute separation of the Church and State with absolute toleration for all religions and favors for none; the right of trial by jury sacredly secured; the right of open legislative assemblies; the right of writ of habeus corpus except when suspended by proper authority in time of war; the right to be confronted with witnesses in open court; the right of absolute and untrammeled freedom of speech and press; the right of the people to peaceably assemble to discuss for themselves matters of public and private interest; the right of petition by the people for any grievance they may have; the right of equal and uniform taxation and an economical government honestly administered so that labor may be lightly burdened and equal right to all under the law, no titles of royalty by birth or by law, and no life tenures of office are some of the touchstones of Democracy announced by America for the guidance of the world. For these we are battling to-day. For the preservation of these rights and principles let us pledge our property, our lives, and our sacred honor.

Mr. Chairman, every Member of Congress, I am sure, shares with me these sentiments and convictions. The American people as a whole also have the same sublime sense of duty. I am willing to lay aside everything to win the war. We must suffer some inconveniences—so must the people of the District of Columbia. I am sure that they are willing to suffer some inconvenience.

But we do not propose to neglect the children. We do not believe it wise that the children be denied at any costs proper educational opportunities. We should be willing to sacrifice all luxury and comfort for them. Therefore the District Commissioners and the Board of Education prepared a statement of the portable buildings that would be needed to take care of the overcrowded schools. Your committee gave them that amount of money and that item is made immediately available in this bill, so that accounts for the large item you will find in the bill in reference to public schools. We left out, however, the expensive building program.

Another item to which I would call your attention, which is not usually in a District bill, is an item of $25,000 for the Council of National Defense. The activities under this head are similar to those performed in the States by the State government in reference to the selective draft. For instance, in the various counties throughout the States the governor selects those members in the various counties who become the draft board of the county, and the States have been bearing a certain proportion of that expense. In other words, certain of those State officials do not get any money for their services; a few of them do—those who devote all of their time and attention. Now, the performance of that duty was devolved upon the District Commissioners. It became necessary for them to have a great deal of stationery, to employ some extra services; and the District officials who gave their time to it get nothing and will get nothing, except one clerk, who gets an increase of $300 a year, which is carried in another item. With that exception, this $25,000 is intended for the District's share in taking care of the selective draft.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is it intended out of this $25,000 to pay the salaries of members of the exemption boards here in the District?

Mr. SISSON. No; they, as a rule, get no salary.

Mr. HASTINGS. So far as I am advised, if the gentleman will permit me, in my State of Oklahoma no member of any exemption board was paid anything.

Mr. SISSON. That is true in my State, also.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the clerical force volunteered their services throughout the State of Oklahoma. Now, I do think perhaps some of their expenses were paid, and it is my information——

Mr. SISSON. The expenses are paid in the gentleman's State as well as the others.

Mr. HASTINGS. My information is that nothing was paid in salaries, but they all volunteered their services; and I was just wondering what salaries were to be paid out of this appropriation of $25,000. I was in hopes the people here in the District of Columbia were as patriotic and could be depended upon to volunteer their services the same as in the States throughout the Union.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman no salary has been paid to these various boards throughout the States. It is only to certain of the clerical force; and then they have had to rent some property. But this board here is also endeavoring to assist in taking care of the housing proposition for the people who are brought here by the War Department and Navy Department.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Is it not true that each member of these exemption boards is entitled to draw $3 a day if he desires to do so, but that in many cases the members have waived that and volunteered their services?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will yield just a moment further, let me say that that was true out in Oklahoma, but the governor of the State of Oklahoma notified the members that if they wanted to draw any salary he would accept their resignation, and but very few of them resigned under those circumstances. And as the result of it, as I understand, none of them were paid any salary at all, although perhaps a few were paid expenses.

Mr. MAPES. I think that in the country over very many have volunteered their services.

Mr. SISSON. That is true.

In addition to the activity that I have just mentioned they have down on New York Avenue an office, and they also maintain a booth in the Union tSation, so that in the event that employees, especially young ladies, come to the city of Washington, the Civil Service Commission notifies them that there is a booth at the Union Station and an office down on New York Avenue, to which they can apply for assistance in getting rooms, because that has been an extremely difficult problem, not only to get a room in which they may physically stop, but to endeavor to get a room at a reasonable price. And if Congress does not in some way protect us against the exorbitant prices that are charged Government clerks and other officers and employees we will be compelled to radically increase their salary. So your committee thought, after investigation, that this was money wisely spent. You may ask how it has been taken care of in the past. It was taken care of by the President out of the $100,000,000 contingent fund. So your committee thought that that was a proper expenditure and allowed the sum.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. FESS. None of this $25,000 is taken out of the District treasury? It is all taken out of the Federal Treasury, is it not?

Mr. SISSON. No; half of it.

Mr. FESS. Why should half of it be taken out of the District treasury?

Mr. SISSON. Because the District of Columbia and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia feel that, just as the States of the Union pay, some of them, large sums of money——

Mr. FESS. I was not aware of that. I did not suppose the States paid.

Mr. SISSON. Some of them raised as much as a million dollars, and some of them much more than that, for national defense.

Mr. FESS. Is that voluntary on the part of the State or statutory?

Mr. SISSON. It is statutory. The legislatures, you know, make the appropriations.

Mr. FESS. To take care of the draft?

Mr. SISSON. No; not to take care of the draft, but to take care of what they call the national defense or State defense. They have a State defense organization in every State of the Union, so far as I know, where the State is endeavoring to take care of——

Mr. FESS. I understand that, but what I was confused over was the statement that the $25,000 was applied to take care of the draft here in the District.

Mr. SISSON. No; take care of certain stationery accounts. All the States had that to pay, except the blanks. For instance, the correspondence between the local boards and the drafted men sometimes gets to be quite expensive. There is a certain character of that work that ought to have been made, in my judgment, subject to frank, but certain letters have not been frankable, and they have had to pay quite a good deal of money out of the State treasury in connection with the draft. Now, there are certain services that are paid for, specifically enumerated in the military bill, and those employees are paid directly out of the Federal Treasury. But this is an entirely separate and distinct character of activity from that.

Now, I want to call your attention to the street improvements. The streets of the city of Washington are not in good condition. Your subcommittee visited the streets. You can find a great deal more by a personal visit to a street than you can by testimony. Your subcommittee went over the streets out in the outskirts of the city, the real estate activities. A remarkable thing happened with your subcommittee. We each had a sheet of paper with the proposed streets to be improved written on it. Neither of us knew what the other's idea was, and agreed not to discuss it until we got back into the committee. Each member of the subcommittee had his streets marked for himself indicating his opinion at the time as to the necessity of improving it. Neither of us knew what the other's opinion was until we got back into the committee and began marking up the bill, and my recollection is we differed only as to one street.

Now, to be frank about the street proposition. There are many of the streets in the outskirts where there were only a few houses, maybe only one or two on the street, where it was a purely real estate proposition, as it struck us. Now, to put all that building program in would be a great burden upon the railroads to bring material, and a further demand upon the labor of the District. The enormous prices to be paid now for materials and labor caused your subcommittee to give money for streets that they thought were imperatively necessary to be laid. But when we came to consider the condition of the important streets in the old portion of the city, as well as what is called the "suburban roads"—I do not know why they make that distinction, because you go out of one portion of that imaginary division now into the other without knowing it—wherever the money was to be expended in repair, your subcommittee gave them every dollar they asked.

We thought it wise to keep the streets already laid in repair. The very severe winter, the enormous amount of heavy hauling, that has not heretofore been so general for so long a time, has put the streets in bad condition and broken them up into holes. So your subcommittee gave every dollar asked for on the street repair. The repair fund is an entirely different fund from the fund for laying new pavement and new sidewalks. Now, if we had laid the original pavement on these new streets, of course the property owners would have paid their pro rata share of the amount under the law.

But your subcommittee were not deterred on that account. The two propositions were, first, the enormous price to be paid, and, second, the absolute and imperative necessity of not making greater the demand for labor and the fact that we wanted to conserve every dollar that we could in the prosecution of the war. So the same reasoning that prompted your subcommittee not to enter into a building program as to the schools, but to adopt some portable buildings, was the impelling motive that caused your subcommittee not to enter into a system of general street improvements throughout the city. Those are the two items—street improvements and schools—where the subcommittee was able to save the greatest amount of money.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will permit, I want to know why should the United States pay for the paving of Washington streets, except in front of public buildings?

Mr. SISSON. I will say to my good friend that he has asked a question that I myself have asked many times, but your subcommittee is not dealing with that proposition, because we are an appropriating committee and not a legislative committee. If the gentleman had been here during one of the very severe fights we had on this bill in past years, when my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] and I labored together on this subcommittee, he would have seen the terrific fight that we made to get the property owners to pay anything on the streets or sidewalks, and he would then understand some of the reasons why that is now the law. But that, of course, would be aside from this discussion.

Mr. JUUL. Under what method are you proceeding? What percentage is the property holder paying for the local improvements on his property?

Mr. SISSON. Twenty-five per cent of the original payment is made by the property owner on each side, and 25 per cent from the National Treasury and 25 per cent from the District treasury. That, however, has not long been the law; but that is the law now, which we can not change in an appropriation bill because it would be subject to a point of order. With the gentleman's indulgence I would like to avoid getting into a discussion of that.

Mr. JUUL. With the flood of gold that is poured from all the States of the Union into this city, why should the Federal Government be required to pay half of the running expenses of this city?

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will permit me, I think every Member will understand that I do not agree to the half-and-half proposition.

Mr. JUUL. Why should the Federal Government pay any of it?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think it should, except for the Federal Government's activities here. The gentleman and I agree on that proposition absolutely. Congress passed a law some years ago, and it is incumbent upon us either to repeal the law or to carry it out.

Mr. JUUL. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time; but even if it is the law, it is not necessarily like the laws of the Medes and Persians, is it?

Mr. SISSON. It seems that it is. We have tried two or three times to pass a bill to annul that half-and-half arrangement, and we have passed it through this body, but when it went to another body it was hung up there and finally disagreed to. Once the House voted 2 to 1 in favor of abolishing the half-and-half proposition, and we got the bill into the other body, and there it was held up for quite a while, until we finally ceased to have conferences, and then the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made a motion to refer the whole proposition to a joint commission of the two Houses. That joint commission was appointed, and those of us who wanted to abolish the half-and-half plan knew then that that was the burial ground of our attempts to abolish the half-and-half proposition, and our project was decently buried.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to get this straight. Suppose a side street here in Washington, with no Government property facing it, is to be paved. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that they put their hands into the Federal Treasury and pave that side street with Government money?

Mr. SISSON. They do.

Mr. JUUL. And you gentlemen have stood for it?

Mr. SISSON. I have not, so that the gentleman's comments do not in any way affect me. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and a member of the subcommittee having charge of this bill, and as such member I endeavor to assist in making appropriations in accordance with the law. Wherever it is proposed to change the existing law I have always made it a rule to refer the matter to the proper committee or to call the attention of that committee to it. Under the rules of the House this committee can not legislate.

Mr. MEEKER. Of course the gentleman understands that the Federal Government does not even go half-and-half on the franchise. The people here do not vote.

Mr. SISSON. I must decline to yield for the purpose of going into that.

Now, there is one other matter that I want to call to your attention. Heretofore and at the present time the District of Columbia has its garbage cared for by contract. They let out a contract to the lowest bidder. The contract now for taking care of the garbage is $69,000, and that bid expires on the 1st of July. They advertised for bids for the next year, as the law directs, and they first got a bid for $133,000, which they rejected because it was too high. They then advertised again for bids to take care of the garbage, and the lowest bid they could get on the second advertisement, according to the testimony, was $143,000. The man making the bid for $143,000 accompanied his bid with a certified check for $3,000. When the time came to enter into the contract, he declined to enter into the contract and forfeited the $3,000.

The District Commissioners then made an effort to get bidders. They failed. The 1st of July is rapidly approaching. The garbage of the District would not be cared for unless we could get some legislation. This matter was called to the attention of the District legislative committee, and they reported a bill which was passed through the House recently.

Now, in accordance with the provisions of that bill—I do not know, but I presume that the bill will pass the Senate today or to-morrow; my information is that the bill was reported without amendment from the legislative committee of the Senate—in accordance with the provisions of that bill we have put in an item in this bill prepared by the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, and that is made immediately available for the purpose of taking care of the garbage.

It is not necessary for me to explain to you the alternative propositions in that bill, because all the Members of the House were here and heard that discussion at some length. But that item is also in the bill, and will be on its face a considerable increase; it does not matter whether we adopt one or the other of the three propositions. When we reach that item, if there is any controversy about it, I will take time to explain it.

Your committee gave to the school board 146 new teachers. While this seems to be, and is, a very great increase in the number of teachers, the population of the District of Columbia has increased remarkably since the outbreak of the war. The majority of the schools are very much overcrowded, as shown by the testimony before your committee. We went as carefully as we could over the matter, taking the number of children that a teacher ought to have, and, as nearly as we could, estimated the number of additional teachers; and we gave the 146 additional teachers with the understanding with the Board of Education and the superintendent of schools that no additional teachers should be employed who were not actually needed. It was very difficult for your subcommittee to determine with absolute exactitude just how many additional teachers would be needed.

We made some investigation of the salaries of the teachers and some little examination into the amount paid to teachers in other cities of about the size of Washington. In the higher-grade places we found that the teachers here are paid more than they are paid in the majority of cities, but in the lower grades, while the salaries are as much as they are in some cities, they are less than in some places. For example, a teacher getting $50 a month, or $600 a year, would be getting just about what she would get in the majority of cities like Louisville, St. Louis, and cities of that character; but in those cities we found that the kindergarten teachers and some of the teachers of the lower grades were paid higher salaries than were paid to teachers in higher grades. Speaking for myself, I think this is wise, and I think I also speak the sentiment to a large extent of the subcommittee that investigated this matter. We felt that the teachers of the lower grades, selected for their knowledge of child life, teachers capacitated to take care of little children and to start them in the lower grades, should be paid higher salaries than those in the higher grades, where the children are old enough to be able to help themselves to some extent.

We thought if there should be a difference, and if we were making the school laws and had to do with the rearrangement of the law, we would make the salaries in those lower grades higher. But we could not go fairly into this matter, because if you will examine the longevity law of the District of Columbia my friends on the committee will bear me out in the statement that it is one of those mysteries which even the experts themselves can not tell you about, as to the exact amount that will be needed to pay the expenses of the public schools, because you can not tell the number of resignations, you can not tell the number of deaths, and so on, so that if you can come within $25,000 or $30,000 of estimating what will be necessary under that longevity arrangement you will do pretty well. So in increasing the salaries your subcommittee took the lower-grade teachers, and if you will look at the report you will find the exact number of teachers whose salaries we increased. The amount necessary to pay for the increased number of teachers is $127,250 and the amount necessary to pay the increase of salaries is $124,100. Now, you can not grant a small increase in the lower grades without running up into figures pretty rapidly, because in the lower grades we increase the salaries of 936 teachers; in class 3, 498; in class 2, 352; and in class 1, 86.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. A great deal of this is a revelation to me.

Mr. SISSON It is to a great many Members.

Mr. JUUL. While the Government performs a great many functions, yet the United States Government as a Government has no children. Now, can the gentleman see any reason why the people in this city, having $100,000,000 or $125,000,000 poured in here by the National Government from all the States of the Union—can the gentleman give me any reason why the National Government should assist in paying the cost of educating the children in the city of Washington?

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman that personally—I do not want to embarrass any member of the committee—but expressing my own view, personally I see no reason why they should do it. In order that I may get that matter behind me, let me state my position in relation to taxation in the District of Columbia, then the gentleman will understand my position and will see that he and I do not disagree as to the principle.

Mr. JUUL. The position the gentleman occupies is as an appropriator of public money; and is the law such that it is compulsory——

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely.

Mr. JUUL (continuing). To appropriate money in the bill so as to assess the citizens of the United States in a matter which in decency the residents of the District ought to pay themselves?

Mr. SISSON. We are complying with the law.

Mr. JUUL. I do not want to get into an argument with the gentleman——

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. I have stated my position, and I hope it will satisfy the gentleman. I can not go into the reasons of bad laws that we have in the District of Columbia. If I could write the law, I would provide a reasonable rate of taxation on a reasonable assessment of property of all the people of the District of Columbia. Then I would collect those taxes and put them into the Treasury, and when we appropriated money out of the Federal Treasury we would appropriate the balance needed. There is going to be a surplus of about $2,000,000 if we get the bill through as it is written—$1,900,000 left over in the District treasury. If I could have my way about it, I would use that million and odd thousand dollars in paying the expenses of this bill and then let the balance of the money necessary to pay the expenses of the bill be paid out of the Federal Treasury, because manifestly under the Government supervision there are many things that this District ought not to pay and nobody wants them to pay. They are governmental activities. Nobody wants the District of Columbia, for example, to pave the streets and sidewalks around Government property. The Government ought to pay something. Another thing: In laying out the city of Washington, it was laid out on a more magnificent scale than are commercial cities in other States. It is true the people bought property after the streets were laid out. I have stated to my friend what could be done and what in the nature of things is a feasible thing to do.

Now, coming back to the teachers. We give the teachers receiving $500 an increase of salary to $750; class 2, receiving $600, to $750; and those receiving $650 were given $750. Now, in addition to that, they will get the $120 increase, making a total of $870 as the lowest-paid teacher in the District of Columbia. Your subcommittee thought that was a fair increase in salary, and it is very much higher than the average of that paid by any city I know of in the United States.

There is another matter to which I wish to call your attention in reference to school activities. While we did not give all the amount of money the District Commissioners asked for, we gave $12,900 for dental clinics, which was perhaps less than half of what they asked for.

Another new departure to which I call the attention of the committee is the creation of the two-platoon system in the fire companies.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. My information is that the average school building is very much congested now with children. How generally are the portable houses going to be used?

Mr. SISSON. We gave them all that they asked for. It is quite a long story, but I will say that we had the board of education submit to us a statement as to the number of children in each school and the number that could not be accommodated, and we took the number to be accommodated in each portable school building and gave them enough money to build portable buildings to take care of the surplus children.

Mr. MAPES. So next year you estimate that all the children in the District will be taken care of?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely, if the figures and estimates are correct. We make the fund immediately available, so that the portable buildings can be provided. Of course, that cuts out $2,000,000 for school buildings that we had in the bill.

Mr. MAPES. How many school children can be accommodated in the portable buildings?

Mr. SISSON. From recollection, I think something like 200 portable buildings, and you can estimate 40 children to a school building, so that gives about 8,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean to say that this bill adds 200 schools to the number already existing?

Mr. SISSON. Oh, no; not 200 schools; nothing like that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Already there are 300 schoolhouses in the District of Columbia

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will understand, what they call a portable building is a little room. For example, at one of these schools where they need an eight-room addition, they will have three or four of these little portable buidings. They have that all outlined here in the testimony. If the gentleman will turn to page 589 of the hearings he will find that the John Eaton School, the Tennallytown School, the Petworth School, and so on, are all taken up, and a number of pages of testimony are devoted to the number of children at each of these buildings, and the number of rooms they would need. When you say you want an eight-room addition to a school building, that means that you practically have eight portable school buildings there, because each portable building is a unit. Therefore you would have eight portable buildings. We were confronted with this proposition: Either the children must go without education for the next year, because there is no place to house them, or we had to provide these temporary buildings. I will say that it did not satisfy the board of education nor the commissioners, and not a single member of your subcommittee was at all satisfied, but if we had appropriated over $2,000,000, which would have been necessary, there would have been no certainty that we would have gotten one-half or even one-third of the space that the $2,000,000 ought to buy. In addition to that, there is no certainty that any one of these buildings would have been put up, so it was either a portable building or let the children go without school facilities, and we adopted that alternative, although it is not a thing that we like to do.

Mr. MAPES. Does the bill provide for the increased number of teachers that it will be necessary to have?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Perhaps the gentleman made this clear; but in regard to the increase of salaries to the teachers, what would be the lowest salary paid to any teacher in the District?

Mr. SISSON. $870.

Mr. MAPES. That is the basic salary of $750 plus the $120 increase?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. The lowest salary would be $870. Calculate the longevity pay, and the gentleman will have to get that table to figure that out, and after a teacher has been here one year the lowest salary then paid to the second-year teacher would amount to about $900.

Mr. MAPES. They get their longevity pay in addition to the $870?

Mr. SISSON. That is the law; we could not change that. The next year they would get $925, then $950, $975, and so on up to $1,000. If we had increased arbitrarily a teacher's salary who had been in her fourth year to the $1,000, that would give something like $1,200 and odd, so your subcommittee endeavored to make the salary of the lower-grade teachers the same, and made it $750 plus the $120 and plus whatever longevity pay they may get.

I had just started to talk about the two-platoon system. The two-platoon system was gone into with a good deal of care by your subcommittee. It seems in most of the cities they are beginning to adopt the two-platoon system. When you consider the matter first, you would imagine it would take twice as many men to run a two-platoon system as a one-platoon system. That is not true. It takes about 30 per cent more men, and that is done by catching up the slack. For instance, for five days the firemen are on duty for 23 hours, and then they are off one whole day and then off a half. Therefore by catching up that slack and leaving one less man on duty at each fire house, by increasing the force in the District 144 men we are able to let every man spend every other night at home. He may not take his time in that way. He might take a week and spend that week at home at night, and the next week at the fire engine house at night. The testimony showed to your committee that many of these firemen would go home and see their children but once a week, and as one of them expressed it, some of their children hardly knew them. These men render splendid service and they did not ask for any additional salary at all. What they asked for was an opportunity to spend some time at home, and I do not believe that I am betraying anyone's confidence when I say that your subcommittee was unanimous in its report upon this proposition.

Now, by taking 144 men, officers and men, which is about 30 per cent increase over the present force, we are enabled to let the firemen stay at home one day 14 hours and on duty 10 hours. The next day it would be just the reverse, he would stay 14 hours at home and on duty 10 hours and the next day 10 hours at home and 14 on duty. Or you could adopt another plan, 8 hours, 12 hours, and 16 hours. That is, you have three shifts but by arranging the shifts so that they lap into each other you can arrange that a man shall be on duty 8 hours and off duty 12 hours, and the next week be off duty 16 and then go on duty 16 and off 8 and in that way you enable the force at all times to be full and yet enable the firemen to spend practically half their nights at home. So we gave them 144 additional firemen for that reason.

Now, I do not know that there is any other item in the bill to which I wish to call especial attention. We granted increases in some clerical services. For instance, the stenographers were getting, some of them, $800 or $900. Now, the Federal Government was paying very much more than this, $1,500 some of them, and the District government was unable to keep any stenographers. Our own clerks get $2,000, so your subcommittee recommended to the full committee and to the Congress that the stenographers get a salary of about $100 a month, about $1,200. Now, that has been running through the bill generally——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that a stenographer should get more than a school-teacher who helps to educate and train the children? I do not. There is not an occupation in the United States that is so important to the welfare of the United States as that of the teachers who instruct the children, and they are, as a class, among the poorest paid. They take the child at the formative age, when habits are in the formation——

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman I used to teach school myself, and my sympathies are with the school-teachers; but in my judgment when school-teaching gets to be a profession——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, will the gentleman permit an interruption——

Mr. SISSON. One moment; let me make this statement—where the individual engaged in the school work is making that a life work and not a stepping stone to something else, then the services rendered in every community in the United States would be such that in 30 years they would impress their value upon every community to that extent that the whole sentiment of the country would be for paying them wages that are comparable with the duties which they perform. What I mean is this: The teachers of the country could in one generation so impress themselves upon the country that their value would be apparent.

But it is utterly impossible for the District of Columbia to be put in the attitude of paying vastly more for school-teachers than is paid in any other portion of the country. Now, with this increase that this bill provides, the pay that the school-teachers will get is considerably greater than that paid in other communities and in other cities the size of Washington. Now, if there is an injustice done here, the injustice is done in the gentleman's State and in my State; it is done in every State in the Union; it is done by people who pay their own taxes; it is done by people who do their own voting in their own cities, towns, and villages. We are most liberal here, and, taking into consideration the fact that at this particular time it becomes our duty to try to conserve every possible dollar we can, in order that we may put every dollar we can in this war, your subcommittee did not grant increases in salary except where we felt an injustice would be done to an employee of the District of Columbia by virtue of the physical cost of food and the physical cost of living.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the indulgence of the Chair just a moment——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for——

Mr. SISSON. For five minutes. I really do not want any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to talk for so long a time, and if the gentleman from Minnesota desires to use——

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I have been looking around for some of the gentlemen to whom I promised time, but I do not see them, and I have telephoned half a dozen——

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection to yielding if some gentleman desires to speak.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the salary that a teacher receives in the District of Columbia the first year?

Mr. SISSON. Well, the teacher who is regularly employed the first year gets $600.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is $50 a month?

Mr. SISSON. Well, $60 a month, because they work only 10 school months. They get $60 a month, but it is practically like getting $50 a month if the gentleman wants to put it that way.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, then, if he or she is very faithful and diligent the first year, how much do they get the second year?

Mr. SISSON. Now, you will have to get that table. I think the increase is $25, maybe $30.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A year?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What do they get the third year?

Mr. SISSON. Six hundred and fifty dollars, if I am correct about the longevity increase.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And what do they get the fourth year?

Mr. SISSON. Six hundred and seventy-five dollars and——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When does it end?

Mr. SISSON. At the end of 10 years.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much do they get then?

Mr. SISSON. You can make the calculation yourself. Some of them get $1,000——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the teacher begins at $600 a year, and is faithful, and lives in the city of Washington, and pays the prices for edibles and other things that she has to pay here, at the end of 10 years she gets $1,000. You are not expecting——

Mr. SISSON. I do not expect them to do anything. I do not want the gentleman to imagine that I am myself——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am taking the facts as the gentleman gives them.

Mr. SISSON. I have simply stated to the gentleman, and I state now, that this is what we have done and just what we believe is right, and no amount of cross-examination could in any way change my attitude toward the matter at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not expect to change the gentleman's views, but I am trying to get at the facts.

Mr. SISSON. Those are the facts. I have stated them to you.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman stated, as I understood him, that when the teachers indicated that they proposed to make teaching their profession——

Mr. SISSON. Not only here. I took the whole country.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am applying it to Washington. He said that then they would increase the wages. If they start in a profession that occupies 10 years before they get $900, then at the end of 30 years the whole country would rise up and give them compensation that they can live on?

Mr. SISSON. Let me say this to the gentleman, that in my judgment the whole trouble about the school system in the District of Columbia is that it is too much inbred now. Under the longevity system it does not make any difference whether the teachers are efficient or inefficient. You keep them on, and the longer you keep them the more money they get. That ought not to be. There ought to be some elasticity, so that when a teacher shows fitness the teacher may be promoted in accordance with the service rendered, and not in accordance with the number of years of teaching.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. For fear that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have a misapprehension in reference to the minimum basic pay, they received, to start with, $600, and we raised it to $750, and the general increase would be $870.

Mr. SISSON. If you add the general increase, it would be $870.

Mr. LAZARO. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi this question. Is it not a fact that in a country like ours, where the people rule, a school-teacher should be one of the best-posted and one of the best-paid men in the land?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. Unless the gentleman from Minnesota will indicate some——

Mr. DAVIS. Do you not think that we had better rise now?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11692, making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I feel that perhaps I myself have occupied too much time in my remarks, but I ask unanimous consent that the general debate upon this bill be limited to——

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that his statement was so beneficial that we will not consider that he took too long. I suggest that he retain two hours.

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to five hours additional, three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and two hours by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to five hours additional to what has already been had, three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and two by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. GARNER. Not to exceed five hours.

The SPEAKER. Yes; not to exceed five hours. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MIE URATAKE (H. DOC. NO. 107).

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 27, 1918.

To the SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: I have the honor to invite attention to the communication from this department, dated February 19, 1916, transmitting a petition of Mie Uratake, widow of Torahachi Uratake, for indemnity on account of the killing of her husband, a Japanese subject, by Private India Adams, Company K, Twenty-fifth Infantry, at Schofield Barracks, Hawaii, November 25, 1915. There was also transmitted, in addition to other papers, a copy of the court-martial record of the trial and conviction of Private Adams upon a charge of manslaughter in that he "did, through negligence and carelessness in the handling of his rifle, shoot and kill T. Uratake, a Japanese." The record shows that petition and other papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed (H. Doc. No. 785, 64th Cong., 1st sess.), and that subsequently a bill was introduced (H. R. 19899) for the relief of Mrs. Uratake; but apparently no further action has been taken. This office has been informed by the Secretary of State that that department has written a letter, dated March 26, 1918, to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, urging the enactment of the desired legislation in this case and inviting attention to the fact that that department is informed that Mrs. Uratake is in straitened circumstances, and also to the fact that the Japanese ambassador at this Capital has again made inquiry concerning the status of the matter.

It is the view of this department that this is a case in which it would be proper for Congress to grant the relief requested, and it is therefore recommended that the necessary legislation to this end be enacted. In this connection reference is made to a similar recommendation made in the case of Tatsuji Saito, a Japanese subject, who was killed, presumably by American soldiers, at Camp San Geronimo, Mex., May 23, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 194, 65th Cong., 1st sess.).

Respectfully,

BENEDICT CROWELL,
Acting Secretary of War.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask what is the date of the letter referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. March 26. This was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business of Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the business of Calendar Wednesday for to-morrow be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 1, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

The VICE PRESIDENT The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has an amendment which, I think, is agreeable both to the Senator from New Mexico and the chairman of the committee. I ask the Senator from New Mexico if he will not withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FALL. With the understanding that the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut is acceptable to the chairman of the committee, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] had printed the following amendment:

At the end of line 5, on page 6, add the following: "Such property shall be sold as soon after the conclusion of the war as it can be advantageously done."

Mr. SWANSON. I accept that amendment. I think it ought to be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; I shall take the floor later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any discussion on the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Secretary to read this section as it would read with the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the power and authority granted herein shall cease with the termination of the present war, except the power and authority to care for, sell, or rent such property as remains undisposed of and to conclude and execute contracts for the sale of property made during the war. Such property shall be sold as soon after the conclusion of the war as it can be advantageously done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Washington Post of this morning in publishing an account of the proceedings of the Senate upon this bill yesterday announced among other things in its headlines the following:

THOMAS wants President to confiscate houses of rich for workers.

In the body of the article it is stated:

Senator THOMAS thinks there are too many wealthy persons living in Washington at this time merely because they like the glamour and excitement of the country's war preparations. He wants to have the President confiscate their houses and turn them over to employees of the Government who have to be here.

I call attention to it merely for the purpose of stating that I said no such thing. I am not and never have been in favor of confiscation, either direct or indirect. What I did say, and what I wish to repeat, is that there are transients in this city who have no business here beyond the gratification of their own pleasure and curiosity. They do not live here, not being permanent residents, and just at present their room is certainly preferable to their company. My statement was and is that it would be a good thing if the President could by proclamation request that class of people to go elsewhere during the war and thus relieve this community of the burden of their support and also of the houses which they occupy.

I also said, and I repeat, that as to such persons the Government should under the provisions of this bill be authorized to take possession of their dwellings—not by way of confiscation, but after making compensation—so that those who must be here will have a greater opportunity of securing shelter during their enforced residence in the city of Washington.

Mr. SWANSON. If there are no more amendments as in Committee of the Whole——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a committee amendment that has not been acted upon.

Mr. SWANSON. Very well; let it be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, section 7, the committee proposes, beginning with line 8, with the word "nor," to strike out the following words: "nor shall any contract be let until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contracts," and to insert "No contract for more than $50,000 shall be let except to the lowest responsible bidder after due notice is given, the bids to be opened in the presence of such bidders, the Government reserving the right to reject any and all bids."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NEW. I offer a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Addressing myself to the Senator from Virginia, I will ask the Senator if he does not think that $25,000 would be a sufficiently large sum to let without competition instead of $50,000?

Mr. SWANSON. I doubt the wisdom of requiring all these contracts to be let to the highest bidder. This amendment was put in by the committee, and I reserved the right to state my reasons against it. I thought it would delay this work a great deal. Instead of making the sum less I thought possibly it ought to be made larger.

Mr. GALLINGER. A great many of the buildings that are being provided for will be of very cheap construction and rather small, I think, in size, scattered over the country; and it seems to me that in the case of a $50,000 structure there would be very little competition, if any.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, in order to get bids for every little building costing only $2,000 specifications with the utmost detail would have to be made and submitted and these people would have to make estimates in order to arrange their bids. I have an idea that the House provision is really better than this provision, and I reserved the right to state my reasons to the Senate, though as chairman of the committee I did not feel like I ought to offer an amendment. I have an idea that we could get a percentage contract which would be limited by which people would construct these buildings. Speed is the essence of this entire matter, and if you make it less than $50,000 I am afraid the bill will be very much hampered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can it be possible that they are going to squander any considerable part of this money in getting plans from architects and specifications of various kinds for constructing these temporary buildings?

Mr. SWANSON. But the Senator must remember if they get bids in order to accept the contract specifications must be made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes; of course, to some extent.

Mr. SWANSON. If you have a building worth $10,000 to construct, before you can get at the highest bidder you have to put in specifications for material and plumbing, and the entire detail must be fixed. I have an idea that that would occasion a great deal of delay. I think $50,000, instead of being too high, is really too low.

Mr. GALLINGER. As this matter, if amended, will go to conference, I am going to venture an amendment to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$25,000," and test the sense of the Senate on the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, page 7, line 11, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$25,000," so as to read:

No contract for more than $25,000 shall be let except to the lowest responsible bidder after due notice is given, the bids to be opened in the presence of such bidders, the Government reserving the right to reject any and all bids.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the House provision, which I think is much safer and will work better than the amendment reported by the committee. The House had this provision, which was stricken out, and the Senate amendment inserted in its place:

Nor shall any contract be let until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contract.

The provision as passed by the House provides that there shall be no buildings erected unless there are three responsible bidders. The Senate committee amendment provides that if there should be 20 buildings at $2,000 apiece, or $40,000, such a contract can be let without a bidder, and to anybody to whom the board sees fit to let the contract, whereas if the House provision prevails—and it ought to prevail—and the Senate committee amendment disagreed to, if the contract is for a million dollars, three responsible bidders must be secured; if it is for $50,000, three responsible bidders must be secured; if for $25,000, three responsible bidders must be secured. It seems to me that we ought to defeat the amendment offered by the committee and let the House provision stand with an amendment. It is the safest thing for the Government, and I hope the Senate amendment will be disagreed to.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has yielded to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Why not insert the word "and" before the word "not" in the Senate committee amendment and let both these propositions stand in the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. If we did that, there would be a conflict between the two provisions.

Mr. KIRBY. No; the bids are not to be let until they are first considered by three responsible contractors, but it does not say they shall let the contracts to the lowest bidder. Then, why not say that no amount of work for less than $50,000 shall be let except to the lowest bidder? Both provisions might well stand in the bill.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEW. I have an amendment which I am offering as a substitute to section 7 which, if adopted, would clear up this whole situation.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask if it is in the way of a substitute for section 7?

Mr. NEW. It is a substitute for section 7.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask that the Senator's substitute be read at this time so that we may see just what it provides.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] will propose the following substitute for section 7:

SEC. 7. That no work to be done or contract to be made under or by authority of any provision of this act shall be done or made on or under a cost-plus percentage basis, unless the same be made to include an upset fee, nor shall any contract be let until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contracts.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if it is in order for me to do so, I should like to address myself for a few moments to that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield the floor at this time in order that the Senator may now make his statement.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I am moved to offer this amendment in the interest of economy—economy financially and economy of time—which, I understand, is, after all, the chief element to be considered in the passage of this bill. What I have to say on this amendment will be based principally on my own experience as a building contractor. Until about a year ago I was engaged in that business, and I think I know something of the difficulties that will arise if this committee amendment is adopted.

I understand full well, Mr. President, that the motive of the committee in drawing this amendment, the motive of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in what he has just had to say, and that of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in what he has had to say, are of the most commendable character, and I very cordially share those motives; but I think that what they have said is based upon a misapprehension of the conditions under which this new work must go forward. I know that in the earlier contracts which were let here by the Quartermaster Department of the Army for the original training-camp structures there was a great deal of scandal, and I am sure that a great deal of money was wasted. I think I know of instances myself where money was thrown away in the most reckless fashion; but the very fact that that was done resulted in the assembling here in Washington of a committee to consider the question of future contracts, and to devise a form of contract that would protect the interests of the Government and meet the demands of the emergency.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that he add to his amendment the words which I shall propose. Then I will ask the Senator if he will not request the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] having the bill in charge to accept the amendment as amended? I suggest that the Senator add these words to his amendment: "and all contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana will permit me, I will call attention to the fact that my amendment proposes to amend the original text of the bill, which will have priority over the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to substitute his amendment. I presume that I should be in favor of the substitute, but still I want a vote first on the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I can not at this time accept the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], for reasons that will appear as I proceed with this argument.

As I have said, a committee was assembled here in Washington for the purpose of devising a form of contract which would meet the emergency and protect the interests of the Government. Let us see who comprise that committee. The first name is that of Mr. John R. Alpine, who is the general president of the United Association of Plumbers and Steamfitters, who represented the American Federation of Labor; Mr. Frederick L. Cranford, president of the General Contractors' Association of New York; Mr. Charles T. Main, president of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, of Boston; Mr. John Lawrence Mauran, president of the American Institute of Architects, of St. Louis; Mr. Oscar A. Reum, representative of the president of the Building Construction Employers' Association, of Chicago; Mr. R. G. Rhett, president of the American Chamber of Commerce; Mr. E. W. Rice, president of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, of Schenectady; and Mr. A. N. Talbot, president of the American Society of Civil Engineers.

Mr. President, a more representative or a more competent committee than that could not possibly have been assembled. They met, they considered this whole question and the abuses of all the systems which might be employed. They made their findings, they discussed in a report all the different forms of contract, and I shall read very briefly from their report. Referring to the lump-sum contract, which is the one contemplated in the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Utah, and also that offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, they say:

A few years ago the lump-sum contract was the one most commonly employed, and for it were claimed many advantages for both parties thereto which are to-day found to exist in all the contractual instruments which are equitably drawn. There could be no possible objections to the lump-sum contract were the Government dealing with clearly delineated problems to be executed under stable peace conditions, always provided that the bidders be selected for their fitness and capability to properly perform the work, but the committee finds the following vital defects, which it begs to call to your attention:

No steps may be taken until drawings and specifications are complete, the bids taken, and the contract awarded, and thus would be lost those precious months which may be measured not in dollars but in lives.

The history of war-emergency construction shows the development of many projects, originally small by comparison, into works of great magnitude and importance, and for such development the "lump-sum" plan is too inflexible to operate satisfactorily; administration costs must be increased in adjusting important changes, while inequities and dissatisfaction are bound to arise.

At the conclusion of their consideration of this question they say:

Your committee advises, therefore, that the "lump-sum" method be not used.

After considering all other forms of contract, the committee makes this recommendation:

Having advised, therefore, that these various forms be not used, and for the reasons stated, the committee unanimously concurs in advocating what may be termed the cost plus, a sliding-scale fee scheme of contract for both general contracts and subcontracts. In its general application it enjoys the same confidence in the building world as to the equities as does the lump-sum contract, as is evidenced by its very extensive use. Its essential features are its applicability to projects great and small—its extreme flexibility with automatic adjustment of all variations in plan and scope.

Then further:

The general form of contract now in use by the cantonment division in which the percentage decreases as the cost increases, and is broken by fixed fees at intervals, seems calculated to effectually check, if not prevent this tendency. Moreover, under the contract proposed the Government retains the right to control the prices of most materials and of labor. Under these circumstances it does not seem to the committee that such an objection would have any force in relation to this form of contract.

The objection referred to being that the contractors might increase the cost in order to increase their fees.

Mr. President, that is the recommendation, as I say, made by the most representative committee that could have been assembled in this country to consider that question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator says that that was one of the most representative committees. They represented the building contractors and they represented the laboring element, whose work should be supplied——

Mr. NEW. Not at all, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. Who represented the interest of the taxpayer in this wonderful commission?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I think that question is fairly well answered in the character of these men. Who were they? Here is Mr. A N. Talbot, president of the American Society of Civil Engineers. He does not represent any labor organization; he does not represent any interest. He is a disinterested commissioner.

Mr. R. G. Rhett, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, certainly represents the taxpayers' interest. Mr. Mauran, president of the American Institute of Architects, is another. Those are men who are interested in the building business and who understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I must admit that; but the Senator has not given the name of anyone who represented the interest of the Government, which is supposed to represent the interest of the people that there should be some degree of economy in this work.

Mr. NEW. Well, Mr. President, I certainly think that these men—the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the president of the American Institute of Architects, the president of the American Society of Civil Engineers, and the president of the American Society of Electrical Engineers, and others named—while, of course, they are not employees of the Government of the United States and are not the employees of anyone else, are the heads of some of the most representative business institutions there are in this country, and they are directly interested in and familiar with building work.

Mr. President, a few words on this matter, because I think it is worthy of very serious consideration. Under the lump-sum contract no contractor can possibly make a bid until he is supplied with plans and specifications for the job, which must be furnished by the architect. The contractor must know the topography of the ground on which the building is to be located; he must know something of the soil conditions; he must have the plans in order that he may then figure out how much steel, how much cement, how much lumber, and how much of every other kind of material is to go into the construction; and he can not possibly figure those things unless he has the plans. How long will it take to furnish those plans? I say to the Senate that for a project involving the expenditure of a million dollars it will take not less than three months, and more likely nine months, to prepare plans for that kind of a building project.

After that, the contractor is required to take time to figure those things in his own office; he must go all over the plans and make his own estimate. That will require more time; and unless, Mr. President, this bill is to be merely a sociological fantasy we should adopt some system that will permit the completion of this work during the present war. That is the only object I have in presenting this amendment. I know that it is totally impracticable—and I will go further and say absolutely impossible—to get this big work done under the system that is proposed in the committee amendment with anything like reasonable expedition. There will be a delay of months.

Mr. President, the form of contract that was recommended by the committee, to which I have referred, provides for the cost-plus plan, limited, however, by an upset fee in every case. For a job that costs $100,000 or less a fee of 7 per cent is allowed the contractor, and the fees run from that up to $250,000 if the work costs $10,000,000 or more, or 2½ per cent of the total if the cost is over $9,000,000 and under $10,000,000. The fees allowed the contractor, in other words, run from 7 per cent on the smaller jobs to 2½ per cent on the larger jobs.

Mr. President, the contractor who would make a bid on a job of that kind, allowing himself a margin of 2½ per cent, would be a crazy contractor; and, if not crazy before he made that sort of a bid, he would become so very shortly afterwards.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I do not believe that any contracting firm, I do not care how responsible they are, could get banking facilities or be financed on a bid they would show to the bank allowing them a profit of only 2½ per cent. If they have a guarantee that is another proposition; but no bank would finance a building contractor who could show to the bank that he had only figured on a profit of 2½ per cent or less to himself or to his firm.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Indiana suggests that 2½ per cent profit on a contract is not sufficient. I quite agree with him that ordinarily it would hardly cover even a small portion of the overhead charges; but if the Government contracts to pay the entire cost of the operation and the contractor takes no risk whatever and then receives 2½ per cent profit, that is a different thing.

Mr. NEW. The Senator and I are in complete accord. I say that if the Government says to the contractor, "We will pay you a fee of 2½ per cent," that is all right; the Government gives a guaranty; and he is certainly entitled to it. It is, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] suggests, sotto voce, a mere commission; but the point I make is that where the contractor has to take the plans and sit down and figure the cost of the work, he would be worse than crazy to figure only 2½ per cent profit to himself and take all the risk. It is utterly and absolutely impossible, as I think the Senator from New York will readily admit.

Mr. CALDER. I quite agree that no man could afford to take a risk of that character; and no reputable man would do so.

Mr. NEW. Of course not. The result would be just as the Senator from New York says, that no reputable man would take the contract. Now, what is going to be the result? Every little twopenny contractor who is willing to take a gamble would bid on these jobs, and, if the law provides that the contract has to be let to the lowest bidder, the work is going to be placed in the hands of people who are utterly incompetent to carry on the construction either in a short period of time or in a long period of time. That is the fact of the matter.

The truth is, Mr. President—and we might as well all realize it—that all this Government building must be done under the most unusual conditions. Time is the chief element here. The financial interest of the Government is amply protected in this form of contract which has been suggested by the entirely disinterested and certainly most competent members of this committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator read the portion of the contract which protects the Government in the respect he has suggested?

Mr. NEW. I will say to the Senator that it is quite a long contract. May I summarize it? I will put it in the RECORD if the Senator wishes; but it provides that the Government, of course, pays the cost, and it allows the contractor, under $100,000, 7 per cent for doing his work, and the fees vary, then, until they run up to the larger jobs, where the fee is narrowed down to a limit of 2½ per cent. That is a matter of contract. The contractor, it should be understood, is allowed nothing for his overhead expense, nothing for his interest, nothing of that sort. All of those things must be paid by him; but what he gets is an upset fee of a very limited percentage.

I will put this contract in the RECORD, if I may be permitted to do so, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The contract referred to is as follows:

CONTRACT FOR EMERGENCY WORK.

Construction of ———.

Contract made and concluded this —— day of ———, 191—, by and between ——— ———, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of ———, represented by ——— ———, its president, party of the first part (hereinafter called contractor), and the United States of America, by ——— ——— (hereinafter called contracting officer), acting by authority of the Secretary of War, party of the second part.

Whereas the Congress having declared by joint resolution approved April 6, 1917, that war exists between the United States of America and Germany, a national emergency exists and the United States urgently requires the immediate performance of the work hereinafter described, and it is necessary that said work shall be completed within the shortest possible time; and

Whereas it is advisable, under the disturbed conditions which exist in the contracting industry throughout the country, for the United States to depart from the usual procedure in the matter of letting contracts and adopt means that will insure the most expeditious results; and

Whereas the contractor has had experience in the execution of similar work, has an organization suitable for the performance of such work, and is ready to undertake the same upon the terms and conditions herein provided:

Now, therefore, this contract witnesseth, That in consideration of the premises and of the payments to be made as hereinafter provided, the contractor hereby covenants and agrees to and with the contracting officer as follows:

ARTICLE I.

Extent of the work: The contractor shall, in the shortest possible time, furnish the labor, material, tools, machinery, equipment, facilities, and supplies, and do all things necessary for the construction and completion of the following work: ——— ——— in accordance with the drawings and specifications to be furnished by the contracting officer, and subject in every detail to his supervision, direction, and instruction.

The contracting officer may, from time to time, by written instructions or drawings issued to the contractor, make changes in said drawings and specifications, issue additional instructions, require additional work, or direct the omission of work previously ordered, and the provisions of this contract shall apply to all such changes, modifications, and additions with the same effect as if they were embodied in the original drawings and specifications. The contractor shall comply with all such written instructions or drawings.

The title to all work completed or in course of construction shall be in the United States; and upon delivery at the site of the work, and upon inspection and acceptance in writing by the contracting officer, all machinery, equipment, hand tools, supplies, and materials, for which the contractor shall be entitled to be reimbursed under paragraph (a) of Article II hereof, shall become the property of the United States. These provisions as to title shall not operate to relieve the contractor from any duties imposed hereby or by the contracting officer.

ARTICLE II.

Cost of the work: The contractor shall be reimbursed in the manner hereinafter described for such of its actual net expenditures in the performance of said work as may be approved or ratified by the contracting officer and as are included in the following items:

(a) All labor, material, machinery, hand tools not owned by the workmen, supplies and equipment, necessary for either temporary or permanent use for the benefit of said work; but this shall not be construed to cover machinery or equipment mentioned in section (c) of this article. The contractor shall make no departure from the standard rate of wages being paid in the locality where said work is being done, without the prior consent and approval of the contracting officer.

(b) All subcontracts made in accordance with the provisions of this agreement.

(c) Rental actually paid by the contractor, at rates not to exceed those mentioned in the schedule of rental rates hereto attached, for construction plant in sound and workable condition, such as pumps, derricks, concrete mixers, boilers, clam-shell or other buckets, electric motors, electric drills, electric hammers, electric hoists, steam shovels, locomotive cranes, power saws, engineers' levels and transits, and such other equipment as may be necessary for the proper and economical prosecution of the work.

Rental to the contractor for such construction plant or parts thereof as it may own and furnish, at the rates mentioned in the schedule of rental rates hereto attached, except as hereinafter set forth. When such construction plant or any part thereof shall arrive at the site of the work, the contractor shall file with the contracting officer a schedule setting forth the fair valuation at that time of each part of such construction plant. Such valuation shall be deemed final, unless the contracting officer shall, within five days after the machinery has been set up and is working, modify or change such valuation, in which event the valuation so made by the contracting officer shall be deemed final. When and if the total rental paid to the contractor for any such part shall equal the valuation thereof, no further rental therefor shall be paid to the contractor, and title thereto shall vest in the United States. At the completion of the work the constructing officer may at his option purchase for the United States any part of such construction plant then owned by the contractor by paying to the contractor the difference between the valuation of such part or parts and the total rentals theretofore paid therefor.

Rates of rental as substitutes for such scheduled rental rates may be agreed upon in writing between the contractor and the contracting officer, such rates to be in conformity with rates of rental charged in the particular territory in which the work covered by this contract is to be performed. If the contracting officer shall furnish or supply any such equipment the contractor shall not be allowed any rental therefor and shall receive no fee for the use of such equipment.

(d) Loading and unloading such construction plant, the transportation thereof to and from the place or places where it is to be used in connection with said work, subject to the provisions hereinafter set forth, the installation and dismantling thereof, and ordinary repairs and replacements during its use in the said work.

(e) Transportation and expenses to and from the work of the necessary field forces for the economical and successful prosecution of the work, procuring labor and expediting the production and transportation of material and equipment.

(f) Salaries of resident engineers, superintendents, timekeepers, foremen, and other employees at the field offices of the contractor in connection with said work. In case the full time of any field employee of the contractor is not applied to said work but is divided between said work and other work, his salary shall be included in this item only in proportion to the actual time applied to this work.

(g) Buildings and equipment required for necessary field offices, commissary, and hospital and the cost of maintaining and operating said offices, commissary, and hospital, including such minor expenses as telegrams, telephone service, expressage, postage, etc.

(h) Such bonds, fire, public liability, employers' liability, workmen's compensation, and other insurance as the contracting officer may approve or require and such losses and expenses, not compensated by insurance or otherwise, as are found and certified by the contracting officer to have been actually sustained (including settlements made with the written consent and approval of the contracting officer) by the contractor in connection with said work, and to have clearly resulted from causes other than the fault or neglect of the contractor. Such losses and expenses shall not be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of determining the contractor's fee. The cost of reconstruction and replacing any of the work destroyed or damaged shall be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of reimbursement to the contractor, but not for the purpose of determining the contractor's fee, except as hereinafter provided.

(i) Permit fees, deposits, royalties, and other similar items of expense incidental to the execution of this contract, and necessarily incurred. Expenditures under this item must be approved in advance by the contracting officer.

(j) Such proportion of the transportation, traveling, and hotel expenses of officers, engineers, and other employees of the contractor as is actually incurred in connection with this work.

(k) Such other items as should in the opinion of the contracting officer be included in the cost of the work. When such an item is allowed by the contracting officer it shall be specifically certified as being allowed under this paragraph.

The United States reserves the right to pay directly to common carriers any or all freight charges on material of all kinds, and machinery, furnished under this contract, and certified by the contracting officer as being for installation or for consumption in the course of the work hereunder; the contractor shall be reimbursed for such freight charges of this character as it shall pay and as shall be specifically certified by the contracting officer; but the contractor shall have no fee based on such expenditures. Freight charges paid by the contractor for transportation of construction equipment, construction plant, tools, and supplies of every character shall be treated as part of the cost of the work upon which the contractor's fee shall be based, provided that charges for transportation of such construction equipment, construction plant, and tools over distances in excess of 500 miles shall require the special approval of the contracting officer.

No salaries of the contractor's executive officers, no part of the expense incurred in conducting the contractor's main office or regularly established branch office, and no overhead expenses of any kind, except as specifically listed above, shall be included in the cost of the work, nor shall any interest on capital employed or on borrowed money be included in the cost of the work.

The contractor shall take advantage to the extent of its ability of all discounts available, and when unable to take such advantage shall promptly notify the contracting officer of its inability and its reasons therefor.

All revenue from the operations of the commissary, hospital, or other facilities, or from rebates, refunds, etc., shall be accounted for by the contractor and applied in reduction of the cost of the work.

ARTICLE III.

Determination of fee: As full compensation for the services of the contractor, including profit and all general overhead expense, except as herein specifically provided, the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor in the manner hereinafter prescribed a fee to be determined at the time of completion of the work from the following schedule, except as hereinafter otherwise provided:

If the cost of the work is $100,000 or under, a fee of 7 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $100,000 and under $125,000, a fee of $7,000.

If the cost of the work is over $1,500,000 and under $1,650,000, a fee of $82,500.

If the cost of the work is over $1,650,000 and under $2,200,000, a fee of 5 per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $2,450,000 and under $2,850,000, a fee of 4½ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $7,400,000 and under $7,750,000, a fee of 3 per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $7,750,000 and under $8,350,000, a fee of $235,500.

If the cost of the work is over $8,350,000 and under $8,800,000, a fee of 2¾ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $10,000,000, a fee of $250,000.

Provided, however, that the fee upon such part of the cost of the work as is represented by payments to subcontractors, under subdivision (b) of Article II hereof, shall in each of the above contingencies be 2½ per cent and no more of the amount of such part of the cost.

The cost of materials purchased or furnished by the contracting officer for said work, exclusive of all freight charges thereon, shall be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of reckoning such fee to the contractor, but for no other purpose.

The fee for reconstructing and replacing any of the work destroyed or damaged shall be such percentage of the cost thereof—not exceeding 7 per cent—as the contracting officer may determine.

The total fee to the contractor hereunder shall in no event exceed the sum of ———, anything in this agreement to the contrary notwithstanding.

ARTICLE IV.

Payments: On or about the 7th day of each month the contracting officer and the contractor shall prepare a statement showing as completely as possible: (1) The cost of the work up to and including the last day of the previous month; (2) the cost of the materials furnished by the contracting officer up to and including such last day; and (3) an amount equal to 2½ per cent, except as herein otherwise provided, of the sum of (1) and (2) on account of the contractor's fee; and the contractor at such time shall deliver to the contracting officer original signed pay rolls for labor, original invoices for materials purchased, and all other original papers not theretofore delivered supporting expenditures claimed by the contractor to be included in the cost of the work. If there be any item or items entering into such statement upon which the contractor and the contracting officer can not agree, the decision of the contracting officer as to such disputed item or items shall govern. The contracting officer shall then pay to the contractor on or about the 9th day of each month the cost of the work mentioned in (1) and the fee mentioned in (3) of such statement, less all previous payments. When the statement above mentioned includes any work of reconstructing and replacing work destroyed or damaged, the payment on account of the fee in (3) for such reconstruction and replacement work shall be computed at such rate, not exceeding 2½ per cent, as the contracting officer may determine. The statement so made and all payments made thereon shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto, except as provided in Article XIV hereof. The contracting officer may also make payments at more frequent intervals for the purpose of enabling the contractor to take advantage of discounts at intervals between the dates above mentioned or for other lawful purposes. Upon final completion of said work the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as determined under Articles II and III hereof.

ARTICLE V.

Inspection and audit: The contracting officer shall at all times be afforded proper facilities for inspection of the work and shall at all times have access to the premises, to the work and material, and to all books, records, correspondence, instructions, plans, drawings, receipts, vouchers, and memoranda of every description of the contractor pertaining to said work; and the contractor shall preserve for a period of two years after its completion or cessation of work under this contract all the books, records, and other papers just mentioned. Any duly authorized representative of the contractor shall be accorded the privilege of examining the books, records, and papers of the contracting officer relating to said work for the purpose of checking up and verifying the cost of said work. The system of accounting to be employed by the contractor shall be such as is satisfactory to the contracting officer.

If at any time the contracting officer shall find that bills for labor, material, or other bills legitimately incurred by the contractor hereunder are not promptly paid by the contractor, the contracting officer may, in his discretion, refuse to make further payments to the contractor until all such obligations past due shall have been paid. Should the contractor neglect or refuse to pay such bills within five days after notice from the contracting officer so to do, then the contracting officer shall have the right to pay such bills directly, in which event such direct payments shall not be included in the cost of the work.

ARTICLE VI.

Special requirements: The contractor hereby agrees that it will:

(a) Begin the work herein specified at the earliest time practicable, and diligently proceed so that such work may be completed at the earliest possible date.

(b) Promptly pay for all labor, material, or other service rendered.

(c) Procure and thereafter maintain such insurance in such forms and in such amounts and for such periods of time as the contracting officer may approve or require.

(d) Procure all necessary permits and licenses, and obey and abide by all laws, regulations, ordinances, and other rules applying to such work, of the United States of America, of the State or Territory wherein such work is done, of any subdivision thereof, or of any duly constituted public authority.

(e) Unless this provision is waived by the contracting officer, insert in every contract made by it for the furnishing to it of services, materials, supplies, machinery, and equipment, or the use thereof, for the purposes of the work hereunder, a provision that such contract is assignable to the United States; will make all such contracts in its own name, and will not bind or purport to bind the United States or the contracting officer thereunder.

(f) In every subcontract made in accordance with the provisions hereof, require the subcontractor to agree to comply fully with all the undertakings and obligations of the contractor herein, excepting such as do not apply to such subcontractor's work.

(g) At all times keep at the site of the work a duly appointed representative who shall receive and execute on the part of the contractor such notices, directions, and instructions as the contracting officer may desire to give.

(h) At all times use its best efforts in all its acts hereunder to protect and subserve the interest of the contracting officer and the United States.

ARTICLE VII.

Right to terminate contract: Should the contractor at any time refuse, neglect, or fail in any respect to prosecute the work with promptness and diligence, or default in the performance of any of the agreements herein contained, the contracting officer may, at his option, after five days' written notice to the contractor, terminate this contract, and may enter upon the premises and take possession, for the purpose of completing said work, of all materials, tools, equipment, and appliances, and all options, privileges, and rights, and may complete, or employ any other person or persons to complete said work. In case of such termination of the contract, the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor for such amounts of money on account of the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as will result in fully reimbursing the contractor for the cost of the work up to the time of such termination, plus a fee computed thereon at the rate or rates for monthly payments set forth in Article IV hereof; and the contracting officer shall also pay to the contractor compensation, either by purchase or rental, at the election of the contracting officer, for any equipment retained; such compensation, in the event of rental, to be in accordance with paragraph (c) of Article II, and in the event of purchase to be based upon the valuation, determined by the contracting officer as of the time of his taking such possession. The contractor hereby agrees that such payments when made shall constitute full settlement of all claims of the contractor against the contracting officer and the United States or either of them for money claimed to be due to the contractor for any reason whatsoever. In case of such termination of the contract the contracting officer shall further assume and become liable for all such obligations, commitments, and unliquidated claims as the contractor may have theretofore in good faith undertaken or incurred in connection with said work, and the contractor shall, as a condition of receiving the payments mentioned in this article, execute and deliver all such papers, and take all such steps as the contracting officer may require for the purpose of fully vesting in him the rights and benefits of the contractor under such obligations or commitments. When the contracting officer shall have performed the duties incumbent upon him under the provisions of this article, the contracting officer shall thereafter be entirely released and discharged of and from any and all demands, actions, or claims of any kind on the part of the contractor hereunder or on account hereof.

ARTICLE VIII.

Abandonment of work by contracting officer: If conditions should arise which, in the opinion of the contracting officer, make it advisable or necessary to cease work under this contract, the contracting officer may abandon the work and terminate this contract. In such case the contracting officer shall assume and become liable for all such obligations, commitments, and unliquidated claims as the contractor may have theretofore, in good faith, undertaken or incurred in connection with said work; and the contractor shall, as a condition of receiving the payments mentioned in this article, execute and deliver all such papers, and take all such steps as the contracting officer may require for the purpose of fully vesting in him the rights and benefits of the contractor under such obligations or commitments. The contracting officer shall pay to the contractor such an amount of money on account of the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as will result in the contractor receiving full reimbursement for the cost of the work up to the time of such abandonment, plus a fee to be computed in the following manner: To the cost of the work up to the time of such abandonment shall be added the amount of the contractual obligations or commitments assumed by the contracting officer, and such total shall be treated as the cost of the work, upon which the fee shall be computed in accordance with the provisions of Article III hereof. When the contracting officer shall have performed the duties incumbent upon him under the provisions of this article, the contracting officer and the United States shall thereafter be entirely released and discharged of and from any and all demands, actions, or claims of any kind on the part of the contractor hereunder or on account hereof.

ARTICLE IX.

Bond: The contractor shall, prior to commencing the said work, furnish a bond, with sureties satisfactory to the contracting officer, in the sum of $———, conditioned upon its full and faithful performance of all the terms, conditions, and provisions of this contract, and upon its prompt payment of all bills for labor, material, or other service furnished to the contractor.

ARTICLE X.

Convict labor: No person or persons shall be employed in the performance of this contract who are undergoing sentence of imprisonment at hard labor imposed by the courts of any of the several States, Territories, or municipalities having criminal jurisdiction.

ARTICLE XI.

Hours and conditions of labor: No laborer or mechanic doing any part of the work contemplated by this contract, in the employ of the contractor or any subcontractor contracting for any part of said work contemplated, shall be required or permitted to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day upon such work, such prohibition being in accordance with the act approved June 19, 1912, limiting the hours of daily service of mechanics and laborers on work under contracts to which the United States is a party. For each violation of the requirements of this article a penalty of $5 shall be imposed upon the contractor for each laborer or mechanic for every calendar day in which said employee is required or permitted to labor more than eight hours upon said work, and all penalties thus imposed shall be withheld for the use and benefit of the United States: Provided, That this paragraph shall not be enforced nor shall any penalty be exacted in case such violation shall occur while there is in effect any valid Executive order suspending the provisions of said act approved June 19, 1912, or waiving the provisions and stipulations thereof with respect to either this contract or any class of contracts in which this contract shall be included, or when the violation shall be due to any extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture, or to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, by danger to life or property, or by other extraordinary events or conditions on account of which, by subsequent Executive order, such past violation shall have been excused.

In the event of any dispute with reference to wages, hours, or other conditions appertaining to said work, between the Contractor or any subcontractor and labor employed by him on said work, the contractor or subcontractor shall immediately notify the contracting officer of the existence of such dispute and the reasons therefor. The contracting officer may, at his option, instruct the contractor or subcontractor involved in such dispute as to the method or steps which the contractor or subcontractor should follow with reference thereto, and the contractor or subcontractor shall thereupon comply with such instructions.

ARTICLE XII.

Right to transfer or sublet: Neither this contract, nor any interest therein, shall be assigned or transferred. The contractor shall not enter into any subcontract for any part of the work herein specified without the consent and approval in writing of the contracting officer. In case of such assignment, transfer, or subletting without the consent and approval, in writing, of the contracting officer, the contracting officer may refuse to carry out this contract either with the transferrer or transferee, but all rights of action for any breach of this contract by the contractor are reserved to the United States.

ARTICLE XIII.

No participation in profits by Government officials: No Member of or Delegate to Congress, or Resident Commissioner, nor any other person belonging to or employed in the military service of the United States, is or shall be admitted to any share or part of this contract, or to any benefit that may arise therefrom, but this article shall not apply to this contract so far as it may be within the operation or exception of section 116 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909. (35 Stats., 1109.)

ARTICLE XIV.

Settlement of disputes: This contract shall be interpreted as a whole and the intent of the whole instrument, rather than the interpretation of any special clause, shall govern. If any doubts or disputes shall arise as to the meaning or interpretation of anything in this contract, or if the contractor shall consider itself prejudiced by any decision of the contracting officer made under the provisions of Article IV hereof, the matter shall be referred to the officer in charge of cantonment construction for determination. If, however, the contractor shall feel aggrieved by the decision of the officer in charge of cantonment construction, it shall have the right to submit the same to the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto.

ARTICLE XV.

This contract shall bind and inure to the contractor and its successors.

It is understood and agreed that wherever the words "contracting officer" are used herein, the same shall be construed to include his successor in office, any other person to whom the duties of the contracting officer may be assigned by the Secretary of War, and any duly appointed representative of the contracting officer.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, before the Senator gets through with his remarks, will he explain what inducement there is for the contractor to limit the cost? The Senator has used the words "upset fee." I am not a contractor or builder and I do not understand that term. I did not know but that the upset fee might be related in some way to the limit of cost.

Mr. NEW. Yes, Mr. President; there is an incentive for the contractor to keep down the cost, because the higher the cost the less his fee. Under this contract he gets a bigger pay if the cost is small than he does if the cost is large.

Mr. GALLINGER. Apparently, it is just the opposite of the system that was adopted a little while ago in giving contracts for shipbuilding, and so forth.

Mr. NEW. It is. In answer to what the Senator from New Hampshire says, I will say that is absolutely correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question right here, suppose there is a piece of work that ought to cost $100,000 and with the right degree of economy it could be completed for $100,000, but the contractor allows slacking, pays big prices for material, and it costs, say, $200,000; would his fee be less than it would if it had cost $100,000, according to the table and according to that form of contract?

Mr. NEW. Well, Mr. President, the Government, of course, reserves the right to withdraw or cancel any contract at any time when anything of that sort is attempted. Let me read to the Senator what the contract provides:

If the cost of the work is $100,000 or under, a fee of 7 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is $100,000 and under $125,000, a fee of $7,000.

If the cost of the work is over $125,000 and under $450,000, a fee of 6½ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $450,000 and under $500,000, a fee of $29,250.

If the cost of the work is over $500,000 and under $1,000,000, a fee of 6 per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $1,000,000 and under $1,100,000, a fee of $60,000.

If the cost of the work is over $1,100,000 and under $1,500,000, a fee of 5½ per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $1,500,000 and under $1,650,000, a fee of $82,500.

If the cost of the work is over $1,650,000 and under $2,200,000, a fee of 5 per cent.

If the cost of the work is over $2,200,000 and under $2,450,000 a fee of $110,000.

If the cost of the work is over $2,450,000 and under $2,850,000, a fee of 4½ per cent.

Those fees, Mr. President, are certainly reasonable fees and less than are figured by any business man in any manufacturing business of which I have knowledge.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I could not, of course, make the computation as rapidly as the Senator was reading those figures, and could not make it at all without the use of pencil and paper; but my conviction was, from the figures he read, that there will always be some encouragement for making the work cost a little more, because the fee will be larger; and the Senator knows the worse than scandal that has occurred in the building of all of our cantonments up to the present time, where the costs have been from one and a half to four times what they should have been.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, as to the earlier contracts, I am in complete accord with the Senator from North Dakota. As to the later ones, I can not agree with him. I think it was just what happened in the building of the earlier cantonments that resulted in bringing this committee together and the proposing of this contract, which I really think, both from my experience in the business and after a very careful consideration of it, is the best form of contract that could possibly be devised for the character of work that is to be done under this bill.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. Has the Senator explained what method is pursued in arriving at the cost of the different projects? Who fixes the cost on which the profit is based?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, that is all very carefully supervised, and somewhere here there is a provision——

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will permit me, as I understand the Government and the contractor to whom they contemplate awarding a piece of work agree upon the probable cost. The contractor makes the bid formally, and the Government goes over his figures and agrees that the operation should cost a certain sum, and upon that they base the upset profit allowance. If the work, when completed, costs more than he estimated, his profit is a little bit less; and if the cost is less than the agreed price, then the contractor and the Government in some manner divide the saving.

Mr. NEW. That is about correct; yes.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, that is all very well if the greatest possible care is taken in making the estimates. There is great danger, sometimes, that the costs fixed by the Government experts and the contractor might be higher than they ought to be, and in that way the contractor might profit unduly.

Mr. NEW. Of course, Mr. President, any business relation that may be entered into finally gets back to the point that you have got to trust somebody's honesty. It is just as possible, I suppose, for two men to get together and set up a job in the building business, and no more so, as it is for them to get together and set up one in any other line of business. But I do not believe, Mr. President, that under this contract there is any prospect of anything of that kind.

I am simply presenting this matter for the attention of the Senate, believing, as I do, that the recommendations of such a committee as has given its time and its thought to devising this contract should receive the favorable consideration to which it is entitled; and I warn the Senate now in conclusion that if the department is forced to let these contracts for housing under the lump-sum plan, simply to the lowest bidder, you will have entered upon a project that will delay the completion of these jobs by months. There will be nothing substantial done on them during the year 1918. Now, take my word for that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Why does the Senator think that the only method by which we can get the Government buildings erected or work done for or in behalf of the Government is by means of the cost-plus contract? Does not the Senator know that the cost-plus contract has done a great deal to demoralize the various lines of business activity and industry; that it has caused many of the strikes; that it has greatly enhanced the cost of the buildings that have been erected for the Government and the cost of the articles and products which the Government has been compelled to employ? And, if I may be permitted to ask another question in connection with the first two, does not the Senator think that this is a very excellent time to give the small contractors a chance to get into the game, into the field of activity again and to rescue the business of the country from a few enormous corporations and trusts?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, in answer to those questions, taking them categorically, I would say that I think the cost-plus contract has been greatly abused in times past, both with reference to Government contracts and in reference to private contracts, too; but I have just sought here, with some pains and I fear ineffectually, to show how the cost-plus contract has been revised and limited by this committee so that there can not be an abuse of it. As to the small contractors getting into it, Mr. President, we all understand that a number of these projects involve the expenditure of several million dollars, absolutely beyond the power of the small contractor to handle.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why so, Mr. President, if the Government pays it all?

Mr. NEW. Well, all right; then the Government can let this work to any contractor it chooses. There is no limit. In answer to the question of the Senator from North Dakota I was assuming that he directed it toward the smaller contractor under the lump-sum plan.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that the Government pays for the labor and the Government pays for the material as you go along.

Mr. NEW. Why, certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Therefore the Government has the responsibility; and what difference does it make whether the work is done by a great company or by a small one?

Mr. NEW. The Government can let it to anybody it chooses. I have here a complete report of every contract that has been let by the cantonment division from the start down to a very recent date, and it includes a large number of small contractors who have been given this work; but, of course, Mr. President, it must be manifest to anybody that for the bigger jobs a big organization is required. You can not just go out and get somebody off the street corner to put up a big building. He must have engineers; he must have a great lot of apparatus, all kinds of derricks and hoisting engines and concrete mixers and a thousand and one things that go to make up the outfit of a contractor, and it is only the larger ones who have the organization or the outfit to put up these bigger jobs.

Mr. President, I think I have said all I care to say on the subject. I think the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] understands this question. I think he agrees with me in it. I have not the authority to say that he is willing to accept this amendment, but I think he fully understands the importance of it, and it is simply in the interest of the economy of time and of money as well that I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has made a very valuable contribution to this discussion in the amendment he has offered.

I am a member of the committee from which this bill was reported. I was opposed to the amendment the committee has presented for the very reason that the Senator from Indiana has described—that is, the impossibility of doing this work within a reasonable time if the amendment proposed by the committee is adopted, or the various amendments which have been proposed to the amendment, or as substitutes, for that amendment, with the exception of the one offered by the Senator from Indiana, for the reason that they would produce such a tremendous delay that it would be practically impossible to get any work done.

We all know that the difficulty in obtaining building material and in getting a sufficient amount of skilled labor to do the building in this country has practically demoralized the building industry, as it has very many other things. I feel satisfied that the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana will be a very great improvement to this bill. The chairman spoke of some amendment to that amendment. I do not know what he proposes about it, but I shall certainly vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana in preference to any other amendment that has been offered up to this time.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand it, the Senator from New Hampshire has offered an amendment striking out "$50,000" and inserting "$25,000." I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I wish to say that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana would only be the means of jumping from the frying pan into the fire. Whenever you take the upset fee, then the power is in the board to throw a contract to almost any contractor it may desire. The board can make the contract so large in amount that it would limit the number of the contractors to very few. It cuts out the great bulk of the contractors in the United States; that is, it could cut them out. I do not say that it will, but it could cut them out; and we all know the evils that have come from the cost plus percentage system. Nobody can defend it, but——

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. NEW. Does not the Senator from Utah think that the cantonment division, or whoever is going to do this work, ought to be permitted to make choice of the contractors who are to do the work? Does he think they ought to be compelled under the lump-sum system to let it to somebody who is not going to be able to carry the contract through?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah does not want to put it in the power of the board to say who shall be the contractor and who shall not, but the Senator believes that the House provision ought to prevail with an amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the Senator's contention that the bill itself provides for a responsible bidder?

Mr. SMOOT. The contract should be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. I understand the Senator from Indiana does not accept that amendment, and therefore I think that I shall offer an amendment to the House provision if the Senate committee amendment is defeated. Then, if it is adopted, it will read as follows:

Nor shall any contract be let until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contract, and all contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder.

Mr. President, I hardly think it is worth while for me to discuss the question any further. I think we all understand it, and I hope the Senate committee amendment will be disagreed to, and then I shall offer the amendment I have suggested to the House provision.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, when this bill was pending in the committee I favored the House provision. I thought it was the best solution of this question. The House provision ought to be amended, first as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and as offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The House provision proposes to prohibit contracts on a cost plus percentage basis. The amendment of the Senate committee does not allow anything to be done except upon notice and specifications. With a contract to be let to the lowest bidder for an amount over $50,000, it would retard this work a great deal and would prevent the speedy consummation of the work intended.

I talked to the gentlemen who have been getting up these plans. They told me they would be able under the House provision to do this work. Under the Senate committee amendment they thought the work would be greatly delayed, and if it was insisted upon too much it would very seriously impair the expected work.

Under the House provision no work is to be done or contract to be let under or by authority of any percentage or cost plus percentage. It prohibits paying anybody 5 per cent, 6 per cent, or 10 per cent, a matter concerning which there has been a great deal of complaint in this country.

Nor shall any contract be let until at least three responsible competing contractors shall have been notified and considered in connection with such contract.

That requires three people to be notified positively. It eliminates advertisements and it eliminates the delay that otherwise would be occasioned. The only defect is that after you notify these men it does not require you to give the contract to the lowest responsible bidder whom you have notified out of the three. It ought to be amended to that extent, and after three responsible bidders have been notified to submit propositions in connection with the contract it ought to require that the lowest of the three should be awarded the contract.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the Senator now to say that he thinks the amendment of the committee ought to be rejected?

Mr. SWANSON. I reserved the right to antagonize that amendment when it was passed by only one majority in the committee. I stated at the time that I did not favor it; that as an individual member I would not support it; and other members of the committee also reserved the right to present the question to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I feel, if the Senator takes that attitude, it probably will be rejected, and that would remove the necessity of my moving an amendment to it.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah would not permit contracts to be awarded if the Government does its own construction, and it does not prohibit it from doing its own construction and hiring its own people; but if it desires to go into the contract business the House provision requires three contractors who are responsible to be notified. The House provision does not go far enough and require the contract to be given to the lowest of the three thus notified, and with that amendment I believe it is the best solution of this question. The men who are to administer this law tell me that this will not interfere with the speedy consummation of the work.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then let us test the sense of the Senate on rejecting the amendment reported by the committee. Let that question be put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not know that I understand the attitude of the Senator from Virginia, but speaking for myself, I would very much prefer the bill as it was reported by the Senate committee. I have made some little investigation as to the course which has been employed by the Government in the cost-plus contracts. I think the result of this course has been very disadvantageous to the Government, very demoralizing to business, and has enhanced the cost far beyond what was reasonably fair or just.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. SWANSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply desire to ask the Senator if he has not discovered that the House provision absolutely gets rid of the cost-plus contract?

Mr. KING. Yes; I think that is true; but as I understood the amendment that was submitted by the Senate committee it provided that the work should be advertised and let to bidders after due notice had been given of the work which was to be performed. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from New Hampshire made the suggestion that it provides there shall not be any plus percentage contract. If the Government desires to let this work by contract instead of doing its own construction, the House provision requires it to notify three responsible bidders, and it will be let to contract. They can not give the contract unless there are three responsible bidders who are thus notified, and with the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], when the contract is awarded it is required to be given to the lowest responsible bidder. To require all these contracts, however small, to have specifications and advertisement in the papers and notice, I am told, will entail a great deal of delay, and by the other method they think it could be worked more quickly.

Mr. NEW. If the Senator will permit me a moment, I should like to repeat what I said in speaking to my amendment, that in a job requiring the expenditure of a million dollars it will require not less than three months and more likely six months to prepare plans alone for it, and after that they must be considered by the contractors. If what is desired here is to have the work done within this year, I do not want to adhere to the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, under the House provision, when there are 3 contractors or 5 or 10, they can say, "We will give you $25,000 or $10,000, not on a percentage basis, because there is no percentage basis." That would be contrary to the interests of the Government. This would not prohibit him from specifying a fee to do the work requiring the construction. It seems to me the House provision is one that would protect the interests of the Government and contractors and give the contract to a responsible person who will do it quicker for the lowest amount of money.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The general purpose of the bill is for housing employees. I can not understand any great necessity for letting contracts that will run up into the millions and tens of millions and hundreds of millions. If here is a little house that can be built under specifications for $3,000, it is not going to take six months to get out the specifications, and you can let it to a contractor to make 5 of them or to make 500 of them without any delay whatever.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I have the floor, but I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will permit me, the Shipping Board has already taken up the building of this sort of houses, and I am informed that the commission in the Department of Labor has perfected plans to build the houses provided for under the bill being considered. It is not the purpose of the Government to give a contract to build two or three houses to a contractor. Wherever it can be arranged, it is the intention to loan money to a subsidiary corporation of some sort in the different localities, which usually will be controlled by the particular industry to be helped. At Newport News $3,000,000 has been advanced. At Camden, N. J., $3,000,000 will be loaned to a building corporation, and I am quite sure this will be the usual practice.

In the main, these houses are a fixed type. There will be some $1,000, $2,000, and $3,000 houses, and the contract will be let to one builder to take over the entire operation.

I think we could go as far as to provide that in every single case these building operations should be let by competitive bidding.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator let me propound a question to him? The Senator is perhaps more familiar than any other Senator here in regard to building operations. Does not the Senator believe, from his large experience, that the Government would have these houses built as quickly and far more economically by advertising and taking contracts from builders in the various parts of the country where the buildings are to be erected?

Mr. CALDER. I do, Mr. President, and I am under the impression that while the department charged with carrying out this law could award the building on a lump-sum-profit basis, nevertheless the terms of the House bill would permit them also to do as the Senator suggests. I know that there are tens of thousands of workingmen trained to employment in building operations who are available to-day all over the country. I pointed out yesterday that the building operations in the United States this year for private purposes would amount to about $300,000,000 as compared to $1,500,000,000 in 1916.

Mr. KING. Is there any reason, permit me to ask the Senator, why the bill should not contain a provision that all these houses shall be erected by persons who have full opportunity to bid and that the contract shall be awarded to the lowest bidder?

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will offer an amendment of that character, I shall be very glad to vote for it; and I think it can be done without serious delay.

Mr. KING. For my own information, if the Senator will pardon me, has not the effect of this cost-plus contract business established by the Government been to drive into inactivity many of these small contractors throughout the country; men who had the proper machinery and the proper organization and could have performed large contracts, but because of the policy of the Government to allow a few individuals to control the construction of the cantonments and other buildings these smaller organizations have been deprived of opportunities and many of them have practically ceased to do business?

Mr. CALDER. The Senator is correct. I know in the city of New York, where I live, three-fourths of the building contractors are doing nothing at all at this time, and they would be glad to take some of this Government work if given an opportunity.

Mr. KNOX. I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after the word "structure," in line 12, insert the following:

Provided further, That no existing limitation upon the right of any person to make a contract with the United States shall apply to owners whose property the President determines is necessary for Government purposes and desires to either lease or purchase by contract under this or any other act authorizing the President to acquire property by lease or purchase.

Mr. KNOX. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this amendment, removing the limitation from the right to contract where the President is given the authority to acquire by contract or purchase or lease.

Mr. SWANSON. I will ask the Secretary to read the amendment again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Chair desires to inform the Senator that there is already an amendment pending, and it can only be offered at this time by unanimous consent, without the withdrawal of the other amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, in a measure I am responsible for the committee amendment. As the section read when it came from the House, there was no limitation placed on the contractors. While it prohibited the cost plus percentage contract, nevertheless it opened a loophole for the head of this building bureau to make any contract he saw fit, because the section provided that any contract could be let to three responsible competing contractors only upon notification and after they had been considered. There was no limitation in regard to an advertisement for bids, no limitation in regard to the opening of those bids. While I may be a little old-fashioned, yet I believe the only fair way to let these contracts is to give every contractor an opportunity to bid after due advertisement and have the bids opened in the presence of the bidders.

Recently I have had some experience with the Navy Department, and that is the system they adopt. They advertise for bids, giving the opportunity to every contractor in the country, provided he observes the requirements of the specifications and advertisement and deposits his check and shows that he has sufficient credit to carry on the contract, and then the contract is awarded fairly under that system.

There is no reason why that system should not be adopted in this building department. Therefore I have introduced the amendment that the bids, after advertisement, should be open to every contractor, so that all would be treated fairly and alike, and that those bids should be opened in the presence of the bidders and awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, the Government, of course, reserving the right to reject any and all bids.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee. [A pause.] The noes seem to prevail.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, before the final announcement is made, I should like to know just what that amendment was?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is that reported by the committee on page 7, section 7.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment was defeated.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to know if the rejection of the committee amendment leaves the House provision in the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I offer an amendment after the word "contract," in line 10, page 7, to insert:

And all contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, the Government reserving the right to reject any and all bids.

Mr. SWANSON. I accept that amendment. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, at the end of the bill, after the words "District of Columbia," it is proposed to insert:

To establish a home or homes for aged and infirm colored people and working girls and to establish an industrial farm and to aid the people who must move from the alleys July 1 and to provide work for the colored youth during the summer vacation, the sum of $300,000, due the estates of deceased colored soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and which was in the hands of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau and has been repaid into the Treasury of the United States, be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to build a home or homes for aged and infirm colored people and for working girls and to establish an industrial farm to aid the people who must move out of the alleys July 1 and to provide work for the colored youth during the summer vacation; the building or buildings to be erected in the District of Columbia on land owned or to be owned by an association known as the Home for Aged and Infirm Colored People duly incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia for the purpose specified in this act; the said industrial farm to be established in the State of Virginia or Maryland on land owned or to be owned by the above-named association: Provided, That no money shall be be paid to the association until the Attorney General of the United States has investigated and reported to the Secretary of War that such an association is legally incorporated for the relief of colored people, and that the plans, specifications, and contracts be submitted to and approved of by the Secretary of War, and the money taken from the Treasury only on such vouchers as may be drawn by the association and approved of by the Secretary of War as the work progresses, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay the money herein appropriated to the association upon the fulfillment of the terms herein specified, and that the association must give good and sufficient bonds to the Secretary of War for the faithful expenditure of the money herein appropriated: Provided further, That all persons receiving any portion of this fund be encouraged to produce all foodstuffs possible to aid the Government in winning the war.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not care to debate this amendment. It is a measure which has passed the Senate twice, and I understand that the House of Representatives has recently acted upon it in committee. I ask that the amendment may be agreed to, and go to conference.

Mr. SWANSON. I would state to the Senator from Michigan that I have not examined the amendment. If it is right, possibly it ought to be in this bill; but if the Senator wants it to go to conference for consideration I shall accept it. I have no objection to it having the consideration of the committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I call up the amendment which I sent to the desk a few moments ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Mr. KNOX proposes the following amendment, to come in at the end of subsection (b), after the amendment which has already been agreed to at that point, which was offered by Mr. THOMAS:

Provided further, That no existing limitation upon the right of any person to make a contract with the United States shall apply to owners whose property the President determines is necessary for Government purposes and desires to either lease or purchase by contract under this or any other act authorizing the President to acquire property by lease or purchase.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is this: Both in this proposed act and in prior acts which have been passed the President is specifically authorized to acquire by lease or purchase, or in preference by contract, certain properties for governmental purposes. Now, we know that there are certain limitations imposed upon people in respect to contracting with the Government. All I desire to do is that, in the event the President desires to lease or purchase property, the owner may have the right to make the contract.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I see no objection to that amendment going to conference, and I accept it for consideration by the conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 7 of the original bill, line 4, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That when available for occupancy, all and singular, the buildings acquired under the provisions of this act shall be placed, in connection with their use and management, solely under the direction of the department having the control of the plant or industry for the use and aid of which such buildings have been acquired by the President: And provided further, That in event of the construction of any building in accordance with the provisions of this act when such building shall have been completed and ready for occupancy the use and management of the same shall in each instance be regulated in accordance with the provisions of this section: And provided further, That all property of whatsoever nature and kind acquired for the purpose of this act shall, when available for use in connection with the occupancy of the buildings herein, be used and managed in accordance with the provisions herein set forth in this section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the purpose of that amendment is to provide that when these houses shall have been constructed at any industrial plant or at any arsenal or navy yard they shall come under the management of the department or bureau having control of that arsenal, navy yard, or industrial plant. I think the chairman of the committee will undoubtedly accept the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the objection to the amendment, if the Senator will permit me, is this: Houses may be built under this bill at a munitions plant where contracts are being filled both for the Army and for the Navy, and consequently the question would arise as to whether the War Department or the Navy Department should have control of the management of the houses. The plant is not a Government industry primarily. At some of the shipyards of the country vessels are being constructed both for the Shipping Board and for the Navy. Again, in that instance the question would arise as to whether the control of the houses to be erected should be placed in the Shipping Board or in the Navy Department. I am willing, however, to accept the amendment for consideration in conference, to see whether something can be worked out to carry out the purpose; but I would not like to say for certain that it can be worked out as the Senator seems to think it can be.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I prefer to have the Senate vote upon the question. I think the amendment is perfectly proper. When these houses are constructed at various plants, I think they should come under the control and direction of the department having charge of the respective plants.

In regard to the objection of the Senator from Virginia, the President can easily determine who shall have authority over the houses when constructed. There are very few plants which are operated in a dual capacity both for the Army and for the Navy.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, under the bill the President is given entire control of this matter, and consequently he can place the buildings to be constructed in the jurisdiction of whomsoever he pleases. If he is deprived of that authority by the adoption of this amendment, some one will have to determine who is to be placed in charge of the housing facilities at a given plant.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, then we simply might have passed a law saying that the President should proceed to do this work without any restrictions or limitations whatsoever. The Senator's argument does not stand. If we are going to pass a measure here, we at least want to restrict its provisions.

Mr. SWANSON. We have left it to the President to determine the agency he shall employ in connection with the construction and rental of the property. Now, the Senator proposes to limit the President's discretion and frame the provisions of the bill in a way that might be very embarrassing. I know that at some plants contracts both for the Army and the Navy are being filled, just as at certain shipyards vessels are being constructed, as I have already said, both for the Navy and for the Shipping Board. In such cases I do not know who would have control.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senator's argument, then, is against the Department of Labor having control, because the Department of Labor would be controlling both the activities of the Shipping Board and the activities of the Navy Department.

Mr. SWANSON. There ought to be one person in control of all these building operations, and we have given the President the power of control. Now, to turn around and segregate it and put the control in three or four different hands is not advantageous in the conduct of the war.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am not providing in the amendment for several different controls; I am providing that these houses shall come under the control of the department having control of the plants where the houses are erected. The President can easily determine some one in whom the authority should be reposed in the respective departments. If a plant is manufacturing munitions or equipment for both the Army and the Navy, the President can determine who shall have jurisdiction over the houses erected at such a plant. It is a practical, common-sense amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, this amendment was drawn when the authority under the bill was placed in the hands of the Secretary of Labor; but the Secretary of Labor has been eliminated from the bill and the President has been given authority to act under it. Therefore it seems to me the occasion for the amendment has passed because of the amendment which the Senate has already adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator having this bill in charge ought to accept and that the Senate ought to agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. It occurs to me that it would be very unwise and would lead to contention if when buildings are erected for those employed in a navy yard some person here in Washington under a different department or a different bureau should control those buildings.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator when a shipyard is engaged in construction to the extent of 50 per cent for the Navy and 50 per cent for the Shipping Board, in whose hands would the Senator place the control of the houses erected there?

Mr. KING. It is true that if there is a dual control of the buildings, then there would be a dual management of the buildings.

Mr. SWANSON. A dual management! It would be impossible to control them in that way. The President has been given complete authority by an amendment adopted yesterday, and the amendment now offered by the Senator from New Jersey was drawn when the authority was reposed in the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. KING. I understand that.

Mr. SWANSON. If we are going to leave to the President the authority to construct the buildings, to control them, and to provide for their renting and disposition, I see no reason to adopt such an amendment as this, which might be very embarrassing. If, however, the Senate wishes to put it in the bill, it has the privilege of doing so, but it would embarrass a unified administration of this measure. I repeat that some of the plants have contracts to the extent of 40 per cent with the Navy and 60 per cent, perhaps, with the Army, or vice versa; and where it is designed to erect houses at such a plant who would have control of them? If it is left to the President, he will determine who shall control under the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] yesterday and adopted by the Senate. I do not think it is advisable now to turn around and leave control to a person who can not be determined.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, notwithstanding the very able presentation of the other side of this case by the Senator from Virginia, I still think that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey ought to be accepted and ought to be adopted. I apprehend that lurking in the mind of the Senator who proposed the amendment is the thought that there is a plan—and I think he is correct—to develop a large housing scheme by a number of incompetents and idealists, who are going to try some experiment here with the Government and to attempt to embark the Government upon some wild, socialistic, Utopian scheme. It seems to me when buildings are needed for navy-yard employees, and the Government erects them, that the proper and prudent thing to do is to turn the control of the buildings over to the Navy Department. If buildings are to be erected for those who are building ships, then turn the control of such buildings over to the men who are controlling the shipping business; and if buildings are to be erected for employees who are engaged in the manufacture of munitions, turn the management of those buildings over to those who have charge of the munitions. It seems to me obvious that the amendment ought to be accepted.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I do not think that the amendment ought to be accepted. I think everything that has been suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] can be properly done without the amendment being accepted. The principal contention about the adoption of this bill was whether we should turn the power over to the President and let him carry forward this whole scheme under such regulations as he thought would be most conducive to the success of the end desired. If we leave the matter there, since the Government is paying for the buildings and since the President has the right to do what ought to be done with the buildings when they are completed and since we have had all this fight and row about the Overman bill in order that we should put power where it can be best exercised, it seems to me that we ought not to put in a limitation now such as is proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. Certainly the power which is trusted to complete and carry out this project will have sufficient discretion to know where the management of the improvement ought to be lodged after it is completed. The amendment proposes a restriction and a limitation which ought not to be adopted under the circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask if the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey may be again stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7 of the original print, at the end of line 4, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That when available for occupancy, all and singular, the buildings acquired under the provisions of this act shall be placed, in connection with their use and management, solely under the direction of the department having the control of the plant or industry for the use and aid of which such buildings have been acquired by the President: And provided further, That in event of the construction of any building in accordance with the provisions of this act when such building shall have been completed and ready for occupancy the use and management of the same shall in each instance be regulated in accordance with the provisions of this section: And provided further, That all property of whatsoever nature and kind acquired for the purpose of this act shall, when available for use in connection with the occupancy of the buildings herein, be used and managed in accordance with the provisions herein set forth in this section.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] I think very wisely proposed the amendment providing that this authority should be vested in the President. I believe that when we all take a sober second thought we will realize that that is where the authority ought to be. I can not agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] that we should divide this responsibility; that we now should say that the heads of certain departments shall be responsible for certain buildings, and heads of other departments should be responsible for certain other buildings. I think it is in the interest of economy to coordinate this work. I think the President of the United States can better regulate this matter if he has the full control, and if he establishes, if necessary, a department to deal with it.

Mr. President, I fully appreciate what the Senator from Utah has said, that some one might perhaps seize upon the opportunity of arriving at some Utopian idea in the administration of this bill; but that would be more apt to happen if it were left to the departments than if it were left to the President of the United States. The Department of Labor must necessarily have something to do with all these departments. The Department of Labor is better equipped and has more information than any other department with regard to labor, and labor is a large element in the construction of these buildings and taking care of them, so why have this duplication? I believe it ought to be left in one place, and I was very glad to see the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico adopted. It ought to be left to the President of the United States; and, for one, I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In line 20, page 7, after the word "used," it is proposed to insert the word "only," and at the end of line 21, after the words "District of Columbia," it is proposed to insert "for such Government employees as can not be used as advantageously in other cities in the service of the Government," so that, if amended, it will read:

Provided, That $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount hereby authorized shall be used only to build or acquire, as herein provided, housing accommodations within the District of Columbia for such Government employees as can not be used as advantageously in other cities in the service of the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, after the amendment just adopted, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill, and after the amendment just adopted at that place, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That the expenditure in the District of Columbia shall be made with a view to caring for the alley population of the District when the war is over, so far as it can be done without interfering with war-housing purposes.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the amendment, now that it has been agreed to, and I will take but a moment. I want the Senator in charge of the bill to understand that this amendment is offered in perfect good faith and with the hope that some provision of this kind will be retained in the bill, if at all possible, in conference, because I can see how we can use this money in the District of Columbia to take care of two very necessary and very important things.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that, as far as it does not interfere with taking care of the employees needed for war purposes, I think this will be a very wise provision, because you will have property that you can dispose of at the conclusion of the war, anyway, to take care of these people that are moved from the alleys. I think it will be very wise for that to be done. I will state to the Senator that I think it is a good amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad to hear the Senator say that, because I think probably the Senator knows the situation in these alleys as well as I do. I have gone through them, and they are simply a disgrace to the Capital of the country. The bill that we passed yesterday, suspending the operation of the law that we passed three or four years ago, will cease in its effect a year after the war ends, and then provision will have to be made for housing the people who will have to go out of these alleys. If we can do it with this expenditure, without interfering with the housing necessities, I think it will be a very wise thing to do; and I hope the conferees will give it very careful thought.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having this bill in charge whether there is any provision in the bill, or whether he will consent to placing a provision in the bill, limiting the compensation to be paid to employees who may serve under this bill to the amount paid by the Government to other employees who are engaged in similar work?

The point I have in mind is this: There are a great many complaints that some of these new bureaus, agencies, and instrumentalities created by the Government are taking away from other departments—for instance, the Department of the Treasury and the Department of the Interior—employees who have been there for years, by offering them much larger salaries or compensation than that which they have been receiving. They are not taking them from the civil-service lists. There is no limitation upon the compensation paid, and in some instances they are taking competent employees by increasing their salaries very much.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think a provision like that would be entirely a mistake. A great deal of this is emergency work, short-term work. Some of the people will only be needed for three months, two months, four months, or six months. We hope in a year to have the whole business completed. It is very hard to get an expert or a temporary clerk to come and work six months at the same salary that he would expect for a permanent job. Consequently as this is not intended to be a permanent department of the Government, and as a great many of the clerks will be used just temporarily, I think a provision like that would interfere with the quick and efficient administration of the law.

Mr. KING. It is obvious, Mr. President, that this bill will result in the creation of a bureau.

Mr. THOMAS. It has already created it.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Colorado states that there is a bureau already created; and when a bureau is created we will never have it uncreated. It will be fastened upon the Government, like the old man of the sea, forever. It seems to me that we ought to have a provision here that the compensation of the employees in this bureau shall not be in excess of that which is paid to employees rendering similar service in other departments. I shall prepare an amendment to that effect, if the Senator will not accept it, and tender it to the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Columbia," in line 21, page 7, it is proposed to add the following:

Of which the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary therefor, shall be used by the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Buildings and Grounds to convert the building known as the Maltby House into an apartment house for occupancy by Members of the Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the chairman will not accept the amendment, I suppose it will not be adopted. I am offering it seriously. It may be a joke—it may be pronounced to be that when the vote is finally taken—but I wish to state briefly my reasons for offering it.

I need not refer to the unusual and increasing congestion of population in the city of Washington. We have already discussed that in connection with the bill, and I hope it is unnecessary to emphasize the importance of using every structure in the District that can be made habitable.

Mr. President, the Maltby Building has been vacant for a number of years. I think it has been vacant since the completion of the fourth floor of the House Office Building. It was previously occupied by Members of the House who could not find office accommodations in the House Office Building. It stands in close proximity to the Capitol, and, although the activities of the Government have expanded perhaps a hundredfold since 1913, it seems to have been carefully avoided, and buildings not a whit more serviceable than the Maltby Building have been leased by the Government at high rates of rent.

Mr. President, that building should either be torn down and its material carted away, if it is not fit for occupancy, or else the Government should utilize it in some way. This bill as it came over from the House expressly provided that the authorities under the bill should take possession of, alter, repair, improve, and so forth, what is commonly known as the Maltby Building; so that the amendment which I offer is not materially different from the bill as this body first received it.

I know it is said that the Maltby Building is not habitable. I know it is contended that it is not safe; but these assertions have been too often reiterated, perhaps, since whenever the subject has been brought up and has been met with that statement, it seems to me, to be at least not well founded. We have had a good many severe storms in this city since that building was abandoned. They have not affected it. I recall one of the severest storms I ever experienced, in the summer of 1913, when the proceedings of the Senate were suspended because of its character, in which it appeared for a short time as though the foundations of Washington would be disturbed and the structures upon its site annihilated. A number of buildings were destroyed, but this old, despised structure stood the effects of the storm, and of other storms, quite as well as the Capitol itself and the office buildings.

I do not know, and I would not be justified in even intimating, that this building has been abandoned because of the pressure upon the departments by the owners of real estate here for tenancies; but when I consider that this building has been passed over so frequently, so much, and so long, I am convinced that there is some basis behind the nonuse of it other than its alleged unsound condition.

In my city some years ago a theater was destroyed by fire. The walls stood, as I now remember, two or three years, the owner making no effort to repair the structure. These walls were very unsightly, and finally they were condemned as unsafe, and the fire department was ordered to tear them down. An attempt was made to tear down the end of the building with the facilities at the disposal of the fire department, but in vain. Consequently it was necessary to dynamite it, and one-half of the rear wall was thus destroyed, whereupon the owner applied to the courts for, and obtained, an injunction to restrain the further demolition of his walls, and at the same time brought suit against the city for damages. The result was that a year after that the walls were removed by the slow process of taking down one stone after another and in that manner getting rid of the nuisance.

I think the Maltby Building is largely in that condition. It has been condemned, because otherwise it might be occupied by some agency of the Government and to that extent the rent roll of the Government would be decreased.

Mr. President, the House of Representatives thought this matter of sufficient importance to specifically include it in the provisions of this bill, and in so doing I think the House acted wisely and properly. It has been stricken from the bill on the ground that the cost of its reconstruction is something like $125,000. Well, Mr. President, $10,000,000, one-sixth of this entire appropriation, is to be devoted to the District in the construction of houses, in the acquirement of houses, and in securing ground, and so forth. When we consider that structures of similar dimensions under this bill are likely, from what has been said, to cost a great deal more than $125,000 plus the original cost of the structure, the argument does not appeal to me.

We should, therefore, either improve this building and make it habitable or we should tear it down, and I do not think any structure should be demolished at this time that can be made serviceable for habitation within the near future.

Practically the difference between the amendment which I offer and the House provision is that the former designs the improvement of this structure for occupancy by Members of Congress. It is a building which virtually belongs to Congress, by which I mean that it has been used for congressional purposes from a time whence the mind of man, I think, runneth not to the contrary, taken over by Congress for these purposes. I recall many times before I became a Member of the Senate, when visiting Washington and desiring to pay my respects to some of the Democratic Senators, particularly those from my own State, I would go over to the Maltby Building, where I would find them very comfortably housed. I recall, too, that during the first session after I became a Member of this body a great many Members of the House of Representatives were comfortably housed within the walls of this building.

Therefore, Mr. President, in view of the pressure for housing, for shelter, in this city, which bears alike upon Members of Congress who are not blessed with a great quantity of this world's goods, who are required to pay excess-profit taxes out of their salaries, and also required to meet the constantly advancing rates on living in the city of Washington, it is perfectly proper that a small portion of this money should be realized for the improvement of this building.

If Members of the Senate feel any delicacy in providing for apartments for that purpose, then let them reject that part of my amendment and let us see to it that this building is improved for the uses of the Government. To my mind, it is absurd—certainly from the business experience of any man who has any business experience it is more than absurd—that large sums of money should be expended for new structures when there are available structures needing a comparatively small amount of money to be put in a habitable condition.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have offered this amendment, and I hope that in the judgment of the Senate it will be considered appropriate, and that it will be adopted.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I find myself in entire agreement with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in his expression. The Maltby Building either ought to be modified or torn down. I was a Member of the Senate and I think of the Committee on Appropriations when that building was purchased. There was no thought then of unsafety. It was occupied by various committees of the Senate. I know I spent some years there with my committee very comfortably. The one fault was that those who might be engaged in their committee rooms during a session of the Senate were unable to reach here on a roll call; it is a little too far away.

About that time the House found itself without sufficient committee rooms and provided for building the House Office Building. The Senate, noticing the elegant structure that was going up for the House, concluded they would also have a new office building, and, of course, there was room enough in that new one for all the committees and for Senators who did not have committees to have rooms. They were taken from the Maltby Building.

Some time after that the idea of clearing the blocks between the railroad station and the Capitol Building became very popular. The matter was brought by the proper committee, I think the Committee on the Library, before the Senate to put a new avenue starting on a line from the center of the Peace Monument and going directly on a straight line toward the central entrance of the Union Railroad Station. A law was passed and a commission appointed and an appropriation was made and the property was taken over. The Maltby Building, however, belonged to the United States and with the other property along the line was all taken over.

We seemed to be proceeding all right. Then certain changes in the House and Senate took place. Some of the people who owned the property where it had been condemned and not settled for were feeling uneasy, because if a house was condemned they could not sell it and could not well rent it.

The question arose as to the compensation to be paid to the railroad company for the old Baltimore & Ohio depot. The President of the United States probably, in the pressing time following the outbreak of the war, forgot the small matter of adjusting those claims, and I understand there is still a lot of that property that has not been paid for and a great deal of other property that has been paid for that has not yet been taken down—is standing unoccupied and going to wreck. Other pieces are occupied and bringing little or no return. The Maltby Building waited, of course, until the occupants were provided for otherwise.

The colleague of the Senator from Colorado put an amendment into an agricultural appropriation bill which arrested the taking down of the Maltby Building and ordered it, as far as it could be ordered, to be used by the Agricultural Department or some other department. There was no talk about unsafety while we were using that building as a committee building, but when it was vacated and we wanted to use it for the storage of many tons of documents and papers we were reminded by the Superintendent of the Capitol that we would have to spend a few thousand dollars on the foundation and in the superstructure in the way of strengthening floor joists, and so forth, before it could be used for that purpose.

When they were talking about tearing it down for the avenue I have mentioned, among the arguments that were used was, first, that it was not an expensive property. In fact, it was bought cheaply by the United States. Second, that it might not be safe for the uses we wanted. So they played upon the tune of unsafety, in my judgment, altogether too harshly and to too great an extent.

My own judgment is that, made, as it was, for an apartment house and divided into apartments for family use, it was entirely sufficient, and is now, with the ordinary repairs that would have to be made to any building 30, 40, or 50 years old, for any ordinary family or office use. The condition it is in now is one that we can not be very proud of. When the United States expends thousands and thousands and thousands of dollars to start some worthy, desired project and then, after proceeding to nearly a finish, to be hauled up by a turn of affairs and the project entirely abandoned, and property that has been obtained is neglected and can not be used, or is not used, it looks very much as if the Government was playing dog in the manger, neither using the property itself for any purpose nor allowing other people to use it. We seem to be like Jack and Jill—going up the hill and coming down again.

This not only refers to the Maltby House itself, but to that line of residences beyond it, some of the old wrecks that are out here disgracing the fields and the sky line and almost, I might say, the atmosphere. I refer to the property between the Capitol and Senate Office Building and the station.

It is time something was done about it, and I hope the able chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who is a skillful manager, will take the matter up and bring it before the Senate in a manner that may address itself to the attention, and the immediate attention, of this body. I do not think the United States can afford to allow that kind of an example of its business methods to be held up before the public all the time. Here we are with one plan to take buildings down and put in the proposed new avenue. That might well be halted in war time, but even before war times we have loped along, going up the hill and down again, seemingly without aim or compass, neither occupying ourselves nor allowing others to occupy.

It makes me think of the time when my old friend, Senator Berry, of Arkansas, was opposed to the building of the Senate Office Building. He figured it out and demonstrated, and it is on record, he showed to the Senate that the United States could build a residence for every Senator costing but a trifle less than $40,000 each for what it could furnish him rooms in the Senate Office Building. That was not so bad. We built a great building, a useful building, and we are all proud of it, but I would clean up the wreck and ruin behind us. Here is the Maltby Building. It stands there as a monument of folly to-day, a monument of our folly in trying to do three or four things and never concluding upon any one.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, in regard to this amendment, I hope it will not be adopted. I shall not discuss the general phase, but I wish to discuss it especially with reference to the Maltby Building. The bill provides for the occupation and use of all the building not occupied on these squares, except the Maltby Building. That was eliminated for this reason: It was contemplated that it should be used for the homes of employees of the Government. It was found that it would take $120,000 to make it habitable in a modern way and that it would house 137 people. Then there are a great many apartments that have been seized for the Army and the Navy for office purposes in Washington. The committee reached the conclusion that the Maltby Building, with a very little expenditure of money could be made available for office purposes. It was constructed for that purpose, and some of the numerous departments now in Washington could occupy the building with a very small expenditure of money, and to that extent could vacate apartments and other places that have been seized, and consequently that would be a wise thing to do. The Bureau of Education was anxious to get it, as were other departments. We have no authority to fix habitations for the various departments. So we left it open, not giving the authority to the board to make residences out of it for the purposes of the departments we have created, and the board can assign this building to one of the departments.

I am satisfied that to make residences out of it would be an unwise and useless expenditure of money. What Congress ought to do is to take some of the apartments now occupied by the Government which were used for residence purposes and put them in that building and occupy it during the war as offices. For that reason that was eliminated. Any other buildings in Washington that are not occupied under the provisions of the bill become available for the purposes of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the testimony or statement made before the committee regarding this building, but I do know that every time the question of utilizing the Maltby Building has become the subject of discussion it has been met by arguments similar to those just advanced by the Senator having charge of the bill, with the result that the building stands unoccupied, and it will continue unoccupied until Congress takes the bit in its teeth and provides for its improvement so that it can be utilized either for dwelling purposes or for office purposes or for its demolition.

I am not an expert, I do not pretend to be, upon housing; but I am unable to understand why a building of the dimensions of the Maltby House will accommodate only 137 people. I know of apartment houses in this city smaller than the Maltby Building which now accommodate many more than 137 people. If the Senator meant that it will only make provision for 137 apartments, that I could understand, but to say that the building would only accommodate for residence purposes 137 individuals is to make a statement that I do not believe is warranted by the common experience of anyone of us.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], far more familiar with the history of affairs in Washington than myself, one of the oldest Members of this body, has very graphically recited the incidents connected with that building from the time of its acquisition by the Government up to the present time. I understand the purposes of this bill to be what its recitals imply. I understand that when the bill was prepared and introduced in the House and passed by the House, among other things, it contemplated the improvement of this identical building in terms. To say, therefore, that the improvement of the Maltby Building for residence purposes is beyond the scope of the bill is to occupy a position which the recitals of the bill do not even remotely support. It would be a strange thing, indeed, if a bill passed at the other end of the Capitol making specific provisions for this identical thing should not have contemplated that among its other purposes. The committee of the House and the House itself understood that housing, the securing as expeditiously as possible of structures already constructed, of structures partly completed, and of structures to be erected were all embraced in the purview of the bill.

We are told that Government employees are increasing in number with every day and with every hour. The city is swarming with them now. In many of the departments and bureaus they are too numerous to permit the transaction of business; they get into each other's way. But still they are coming.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I saw a statement, apparently authoritative, to the effect that there are going to be 25,000 to 30,000 more Government employees brought into this city before the summer is over; that they expect them at the rate of 5,000 or 6,000 a month. With the condition the Senator describes, what they are going to do with them I do not know.

Mr. THOMAS. God knows what they are going to do with them, so far as utilizing them for the Government service is concerned.

Mr. SWANSON. Maj. Potter, who has been investigating the housing conditions in Washington, stated in response to a question by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]:

> We went over the Maltby Building, and we have had estimates that it would cost to put it in safe condition for housing about $120,000.
> The CHAIRMAN. How many people would the Maltby Building house?
> Maj. POTTER. About 120 people.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not questioning the testimony, Mr. President. With all due respect to Maj. Potter, I assume the responsibility of saying that that building can be made habitable for three times that number, and I do not think there can be any question about it. It is a 6-story building, as I remember. It must be 150 feet by 150 feet in dimensions. If we are going to convert it into apartments for a class of people who can pay a thousand dollars a month for an apartment probably that is true, but if we are going to make it livable for the purpose of meeting the present and the coming congestion, it could be made habitable for a great many more than that number.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, that was the estimate made for Government employees, there being so much space required. By others the number was placed at 137, I think. It was figured on the amount of space needed to house 137 people, and Maj. Potter made the number 120.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a remarkable fact, Mr. President, that every time an attempt is made to improve or utilize this building some objections are made, either that it is not large enough for the purpose, that the structure is unsafe, or something of that kind, which leads to the accomplishment of nothing. I am afraid that is going to be the situation here unless the House insists upon its provision.

The Senator from Washington has called the attention of the Senate to the fact that before the summer ends the civil service of the Government will be increased by some 25,000 additional people. A great many of these employees will have families to support, and the actual increase therefore, it is safe to say, will be three times that number, or 75,000. Yet, under the bill, notwithstanding this immediate and appalling pressure upon habitations a structure that can be put in order for $125,000 is going to be neglected.

Mr. President, if this building would accommodate 137 people as inhabitants, it will accommodate 137 offices. If it can be improved for offices, the Government may well yield its possession of one of the big apartment houses that it is now in possession of on Fifteenth Street and enable some of those people to secure shelter there. Why should not that be done? One hundred and twenty thousand dollars, generally speaking, is not of much consequence in this body; it is a bagatelle. I have tried once or twice to save that amount of money in vain, the reasons being that it is such a little, insignificant sum that it will cost more in the waste of time to attempt to save it than to let it go in. Now, in a $60,000,000 bill the appalling sum of $120,000 for the improvement of a large and important structure is so great as to make it impossible to give it favorable consideration.

I predict, Mr. President, that many buildings to be erected under this appropriation very much smaller than the Maltby Building and accommodating many people below the number to be assigned to it will cost a good deal more than $120,000, a good deal more than $150,000, nay, $200,000, because I can see opportunities in this bill for a riot of expenditures approaching in some degree those with which we have already been confronted from the appropriations made for other purposes. I want to get action upon this bill, Mr. President, to complete unfinished structures, to repair old structures as well as to build new ones, and nothing addresses itself to my sense of the proprieties at this time so strongly as the immediate and necessary improvement of this building. I therefore insist upon my amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I thoroughly concur with my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] in the fact that the Maltby Building ought to be improved, ought to be repaired, and ought to be utilized by the Government. It is a structure that has not a crack in its walls. It is absurd, it seems to me, for any contention to be made that it is unsafe. By reason of that condition I do not see why a structure that costs perhaps $150,000 or $200,000 should not be utilized by the Government.

The idea of tearing down the Maltby Building arose, as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] said, from the desire to construct a straight road from the Columbus Monument, in front of the depot, to the Peace Monument, in front of the Capitol, and inasmuch as it ran through a part of the building it was thought to be necessary that the entire building should be obliterated and removed.

Mr. President, some of the architects believe that the only way to lay out a city or to lay out a street is in straight lines, and others believe that the only way is by winding roads. It does seem to me that when we have a fine structure that has been occupied by Senators as an office building, in order simply to cater to the artistic taste of a straight road that we should destroy that building strikes me as somewhat monstrous.

Mr. President, those houses that are below the Maltby Building on New Jersey Avenue are infinitely better looking than those that would face upon that beautiful park with those buildings removed. If any person will go down there and look at the alley or small streets that would face upon the park when the Maltby Building and the other buildings below the Maltby Building are removed, he would find that it would be almost a disgrace to the park to have such buildings face upon it. It was for that reason, to a large extent, that I objected to tearing down the Maltby Building.

Mr. President, the only other solution of this question, if you tear down these buildings, will be that you must, in order to have a respectable appearance, buy clear to First Street, and that means, of course, that some more people in the District of Columbia will get more money for the houses which they already have, and they must be torn down. The grounds of the Capitol are amply large, and it seems to me that it would not be wise to do it.

I do not know what amount of money may be required, but there are some parts of that building that are in most excellent shape. The walls are good; the floors are fair. It perhaps needs a new elevator; but outside of that and perhaps shoring up the interior, not the outside of the building, it could be made to accommodate either occupants or a heavier weight for which it is thought it might be used in storing documents.

At any rate, Mr. President, as my colleague has said, every time this subject is approached nothing is done. The building remains vacant. Nobody wants to take any steps toward improving it, although it is quite likely that if it is removed another structure will taken its place in order to have the buildings facing upon this beautiful park conform somewhat with the grandeur of the entire enterprise.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment. I feel that something ought to be done. That it ought to be confined to Members of Congress I doubt very much. I doubt very much whether it would be well to provide it for Members of Congress; but it does seem to me that we ought to provide for the improvement necessary for equipping this building for the purposes indicated in the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it is an absolute mistake to convert that building into a housing proposition. It will cost $120,000 to house 120 people. That building could be taken and one of the departments might be placed in it. It was constructed for an office building. It would cost very little money to put it in proper condition for that purpose. If Senators want to do something with that building, some of the departments that are paying rent might be provided for there instead of driving people out of their homes for the purpose.

The House committee does not want that building for housing purposes. Everybody who has investigated it says that the expenditures for necessary alterations would exceed its value. We have apartments here which have been seized by the Army and the Navy Departments to be used as offices. Let the committee which has charge of this business take charge of the building for office purposes. Buildings for the execution of the alien-enemy act and other acts are being erected here. Everybody who has examined that building for housing purposes with a view of making a hotel or a home out of it has reached the conclusion that the expenditure would be too great for the number of people who could be taken care of and that it ought to be used for office purposes. This committee did not have charge of assigning offices to people.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator from Virginia that this building was originally a hotel, and that the rooms there are rooms which are really fitted for living purposes in the way of bedrooms. It seems to me it would cost more to convert that building into a public building for offices than to keep it in its present condition.

Mr. SWANSON. It was changed into an office building and used for office purposes by Senators in its present condition. It was changed from a hotel to an office building, and with a small expenditure of money we could get one of the departments in need of outside offices to go there and thus dispose of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the difficulty is that they will not go there.

Mr. SWANSON. Well, put them there, and do not give them money to pay rent elsewhere.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We have never been able to get them there. The officials all want tile flooring and nickel-plated plumbing; they want all of the modern improvements; and they say, "We prefer to stay where we are, or we would rather get into a new building than to go down there."

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know whether the Senator is aware of the fact that all the other buildings on that street which could be used during this war for housing purposes, and other buildings in Washington that are not occupied can be used for that purpose. The Bureau of Education, which employs about 100 people, is anxious to get that building. I did not feel that my committee had jurisdiction to assign that building, which belongs to the Senate, for office purposes. We never have had jurisdiction to assign office buildings to anybody. That is a province which does not belong to us. Consequently, instead of having a fight between the Bureau of Education and some other bureau as to where they shall be located, we thought it was proper, as we did not have jurisdiction of the matter, to have it eliminated.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. How can the Senator from Virginia say that his committee has not jurisdiction of that subject, when the bill which came from the other House expressly includes it?

Mr. SWANSON. It has jurisdiction for housing purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. My amendment is in order, then.

Mr. SWANSON. When it came to a conclusion the committee thought that this building ought to be used for office purposes and not for housing purposes; that it was much better and cheaper to use it for office purposes. The Bureau of Education wanted to have a hearing before my committee and have the committee assign it to them as their habitation. Other departments might want it, but as my committee did not have jurisdiction of the question of the assignment of buildings to bureaus for their habitation, and as others wanted it, we thought the best thing to do was to eliminate this matter and to leave it open, so that the Appropriations Committee or the committees having jurisdiction of the subject might look into it.

I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was anxious to be heard if it was proposed to appropriate it for any other purpose except office purposes, so that the Bureau of Education might get it. That is the reason for the elimination.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think there is considerable force in what the chairman of the committee has said, but I am going to vote for this amendment to emphasize my idea that something ought to be done with the Maltby Building. While the Senator from Virginia suggests that his committee might not exactly have jurisdiction to dispose of that building for housing purposes, Congress certainly has jurisdiction. If the Senate sees fit to adopt this amendment, it will relieve the committee, of course, from any responsibility with reference to the matter. But that building ought to be used for some purpose. I think it could very well be used for offices and for office purposes. It is not unsuitable for rooming purposes. The rooms are really small, and I understand, as the Senator from Colorado has stated, it was originally a hotel. The rooms have not been changed very much from that time, and it could be made suitable for housing purposes without very great expense.

Mr. President, I am going to take this opportunity to say just a word or two with reference to a condition that seems to me to be getting really worse; and in a way to issue a warning to the profiteers of the District of Columbia, and possibly say a word in the hope that the spirit of profiteering, which seems to be growing up and developing here, may halt.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has referred to this matter several times heretofore; I remember he referred to it a short time ago, and I thought that his statements probably were a little too sweeping with reference to the District of Columbia. My experience had been and the information that I had received was that many of the apartment houses and many of the hotels were not increasing their prices, and I thought that the spirit of profiteering to which the Senator referred probably existed more in connection with houses that heretofore possibly had not been used for rooming purposes, but the owners of which were now taking advantage of the situation and were placing high prices upon rooms they might rent, or that persons who had rented apartments took the opportunity to sublet them at a very high rate, and were taking advantage of that opportunity.

I know as to some of the hotels in this city, where I have engaged rooms for people from my State upon telegraphic requests from them, I found that they were not making any higher charges for rooms than they made before the war began. I know of some apartment houses where the prices have continued the same as they were heretofore—at least, no substantial increase has been made. So I thought the spirit of profiteering had not taken possession of many of the hotels and of many of the regular apartment houses of the city, but it looks as if this spirit is, at any rate, getting into these places now. I understood the other day that in some of the larger apartment houses or in some of the hotels in this city that apartments which had rented for $50 a month some time ago were increased to $75, and notice has been given that in a certain time the rates will be $100 a month. I have received a petition to-day, sent to me by a very prominent Government official, that I am going to read to the Senate, and read the letter that accompanies it, without giving the name of the apartment house at this time. The letter states:

With this I am sending you a petition signed by a majority of the tenants of the ——— Apartment.

This petition calls attention to the very serious condition which confronts the people who have occupied this apartment house for a number of years. While I do not reside in this apartment, my secretary and a number of other Government employees personally known to me occupy apartments in the ——— and are gravely concerned in the outlook.

The tenants have ascertained from the owner that he is contemplating the transfer of the building to a private concern for the purposes other than that of an apartment house. The only satisfaction he gives the tenants is that he will notify them two months in advance of the proposed change.

This refers to one of the largest apartment houses in the city, which has been used as an apartment house for many years. The letter continues:

Now, Senator, it is well known that there are no vacant desirable apartments in Washington. The ——— contains 49 families, practically every one of which has one or more Government workers, and nearly every flat has rented one or more rooms to new Government workers who have recently come to the city. In a number of instances the heads of families are now in the Army, and the dependent relatives are in no position to move even if desirable rooms could be found elsewhere. Inasmuch as the majority of the tenants of the ——— are in Government employ, it would seem to me that the matter justly comes under the jurisdiction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is at this time considering the problem of housing the thousands of new employees of the Government. It strikes me that it is just as important that the committee should look after the welfare of those who have worked faithfully for the Government for many years as for the newcomers.

There can be no question that the transfer of the apartment house is a case of profiteering, and personally I think steps should be taken by your committee to prevent moves of this kind anywhere in the city.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the letter which the Senator from Washington has just read is a most interesting one, and is in harmony with information of a similar character which I have received with reference to some of the apartment houses. My information is that the charge of profiteering is to be evaded by placing the increase upon the furniture in the apartment rather than upon the apartment itself; and in some instances I am told that apartment houses—and I will name the Brighton as one of them—are to be converted into rooming houses, the tenants having been notified that their leases will not be renewed. The house is to be furnished by the present owner and rooms, instead of apartments, are to be let, the increase being placed upon the furniture; so that, instead of charging an increase of rent for the apartment itself, the added profit is figured as rent upon the furniture, but the absolute increase to the tenant who must pay the rent is very large indeed.

I do not know—and I have made some efforts to inquire, and so have members of my family—of a single apartment in Washington that can be secured unfurnished, the idea being that by the furnishing of the apartment by the owner and the placing of a housekeeper or some similar person in charge, an enormous increase in return can be obtained by renting rooms and sometimes apartments furnished—a method of evading the general proposition that will hardly be acceptable to the poor devils who have to pay the rent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have an idea that that is the plan that is proposed in connection with the apartment referred to in the letter and petition I am bringing to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say that I have received a great many letters complaining of profiteering here. One scheme seems to be to go to the tenants and tell them, "You must vacate in two months; I am going to sell the building," thus creating a scare among the tenants in order to induce them to offer larger rents. In that way it is sought to make enormous profits out of them. I had a letter some days ago from a man in Michigan, whose son-in-law and daughter, who are employed in Washington, have been living in an apartment for a long time. They received notice the other day that the owner intended to sell the building, and that they must vacate within two months, with an intimation that possibly he might not sell if he was paid more rent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. If I may interrupt the Senator for a brief statement, we hear of instances of excessive charges and of people taking advantage of prevailing conditions. It seems to me we are likely to attribute that to a general situation and be unjust, perhaps, to a great many owners of apartment houses as well as other property in the city of Washington. I believe the Senator will admit that this criticism does not apply to all the owners of apartment houses and all those who have residence property to rent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I take it the Senator was not present when I began.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was not in the Chamber at that time, but I heard the Senator's subsequent remarks. Mr. President, I desire to say this——

Mr. THOMAS. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Florida that the statement I made is by no means general; it only applies to some of the District landlords.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am a little apprehensive that we are likely to do an injustice to a large number of public-spirited and good people in Washington, because I know personally of a number of instances where rents have not been increased to tenants of apartment houses. I know personally of some cases where they have been increased something like 10 per cent, or perhaps a little more than that, but such increases grew out of the fact that coal was, as we know, not only difficult to obtain but very high in price, and the cost of delivering and handling it, as well as the cost of elevator service, and that sort of thing, which some of the apartments furnish, more than exceeded the additional rent charge that they were making. So I think that we ought to remember that these instances of profiteering being published and discussed give the impression that that is a sort of general situation, whereas I do not believe it obtains throughout the city, although it does in exceptional cases.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to the Senator from Florida that he ought to give the names of those constituting the exceptions? I for one, if they have not attempted to hold up the American people, would be willing to grant them a gold medal from Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can say positively that I know of such instances. I know of at least three apartment houses where there has been no increase in rent at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have known, if the Senator will allow me, of people who have spent weeks going around and trying to find some place where they could live without giving up all of their salary for rent, without being able to find the exceptional places.

Mr. FLETCHER. That may be; of course, those who have not increased the rent for their properties have their apartments all rented and occupied.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are mighty few of them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Florida that I made substantially the statement he has made when I began my remarks. I said that I had heard of the charge with reference to profiteering in the District of Columbia, and I had thought that the charge was not properly applicable to the regular apartment houses throughout the District and to many of the hotels; but from matters that have come to my knowledge in the last two weeks I am becoming afraid that the spirit of profiteering is beginning to creep into these places. I know that the place where I live, Mr. President, has made no increase in rent to amount to anything; and that property has been filled all the time. The people to whom the Senator from North Dakota referred could not have gotten in there, because there were no vacant rooms. The owners have not taken advantage of their tenants at all; they have treated them with perfect fairness.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say that the people to whom I refer are people who could find rooms, but they could not find any that they could afford to take, because the prices charged were so exorbitant. It was not because the rooms were filled, but because the prices were outrageous.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not dispute that there are cases of that kind; but, like the Senator from Florida, I think there are a great many where advantage has not been taken of the situation, and I think the time is soon coming when those who have not taken advantage of the situation should be known and those who are taking advantage of it should also be known. I would give the name of the apartment house referred to in the letter I have read were it not for the fact that the petition is signed by tenants of the apartment, and I do not care to give the name at this time simply because of that fact. The petition states:

We, the undersigned tenants of the ——— Apartment House, having been informed that the owner is negotiating a transfer of the building to private parties, who will utilize it for purposes other than a dwelling, and that we are likely in the near future to be notified we must find quarters elsewhere in the city, would call your attention to the fact that—

The majority of the tenants in the ——— are Government employees; a number of the heads of families are now in the Army, and a large number of rooms have been rented to new Government workers who have recently come to the city. The proposed change will be a real calamity to most of these people. There are 49 apartments in this building and there are probably 250 or more people residing there at the present time.

It is well known to your committee that there are no desirable vacant apartments to be obtained anywhere in Washington, and the same thing is true in regard to houses at reasonable rentals. The problem of housing the large number of new employees now in the city and expected in the near future is acute. If the owner of the ——— is permitted to carry out his plan this problem becomes more serious.

The tenants of the ——— look to your committee to provide some relief in their present difficulties. There can be no question that the owner of the ——— in making this change is actuated by purely selfish desire for profit.

Mr. President, what I really want to say is this: In my judgment Congress has reached a frame of mind where it proposes to take care of situations like that, and I believe that legislation will be passed before this session of Congress adjourns that will meet such situations just as fully as it is possible to meet them. The man who tries to take advantage of the situation before legislation is passed will find that that legislation is framed in such a way that it will catch him. The subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia is working on this matter, and I feel sure that that subcommittee, headed by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who takes a very great interest in matters of this kind and whose ability and industry are a fair warrant that a just and equitable bill will be prepared and submitted to the full committee, will frame a bill to take care of the situation, so that the people who own apartment houses now will not be able to take advantage of the spirit of gain and the present opportunity to make large rates just because the legislation has not heretofore passed, but that whatever legislation is passed will relate back to a certain definite period that will catch most of the people who are trying to take advantage of those who are compelled to come here and are compelled to have quarters.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say that there is not the least excuse for raising rents in the District of Columbia. Taxes on real estate in the District are lower than in almost any other city in the country, and they have not been changed for years. I know from my own experience—and I have been paying taxes on the house in which I live for almost 20 years—that they are the same to-day as they were 20 years ago. The only excuse for an increase in rentals in apartment houses or on the part of people who have dwellings to rent is simply the increased price of the coal which was used last winter.

I hope the Senator from Washington, and I hope the other members of the committee to which he refers, will find some way to check these practices. I am getting tired, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I am getting tired of the way we are worked here in this city. If there are a lot of old worthless buildings, which the owners do not consider good property, they are loaded on to the Government. I expect now they will want to unload on the Government the buildings back of the Maltby House, in order that a better view of the Peace Monument may be obtained when one stands at the portals of the Union Station. I suppose they will want us to demolish some more buildings down the street, so that they may sell them to the Government and thus have them taken off their hands.

It is inscrutable to me that the Treasury Department had the hardihood to buy the Arlington property—that hole in the ground—when the Government owns three blocks of good land nearer the Treasury Department than is the Arlington hole. Yet the Government paid a million dollars for that site. They go among the people here and canvass them for liberty bonds. Mr. President, there ought to be a canvass started for greater economy in the public service.

This city is swarming with people. Go through some of the departments, and you can hardly make your way because of the number of young men and young women who are congested in the various buildings. Some of them are apparently busy, but a large percentage of them seem to spend their time gossiping, while others read newspapers. The Lord only knows what all this force that has been brought here to work for the Government is doing. I suggest, as was proposed in a newspaper the other day, that some of the Government bureaus ought to be removed to other cities. One could be taken to Chicago, another to Baltimore, another to the fair city of Alexandria, which is located in the State where my good friend the chairman of the committee lives, a number of them could be taken to adjoining towns, where the employees could get rents at living rates and where they would not be bled, as they are constantly being bled, by real-estate men and profiteers in this city.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think I can assure the Senator from Minnesota that the Committee on the District of Columbia will take care of the situation; that we will try to meet it and try to prevent the outrages of which he complains; and I think in doing so I can assure the owners of the property who have been acting justly and properly, and who have not been taking advantage of the situation, that they will be treated fairly, and I can also assure the people who have been taking advantage of the situation that they will be treated fairly and justly, too.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very much interested in the assurance just given by the Senator from Washington, and I know he means what he says. I should like to ask in that connection when we may expect a report from that committee to the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] told me to-day that the subcommittee hoped to be able to report by the close of the day to the full committee, and I am ready to meet to-morrow morning or at any other time in order to get early action upon that bill. Of course, I can not assure the Senator just when it will be done; but I think he can be assured that the committee is going to act just as promptly as the importance of the legislation warrants.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will not take offense, then, I am sure, if I remind him of the dying words of Mr. Choate, "For God's sake hurry up."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am in hearty sympathy with that suggestion, and that is one reason why I spoke to the Senator from Ohio to-day. I was glad to have his assurance that he thought the subcommittee would be able to report to-day. Then I am hoping that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia will call us together——

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will cooperate with me and the other members of the committee in getting early action.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I am through.

Mr. KING. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that a great many of the employees of the Government are addressing themselves to Members of the Senate. I know a number of them have waited upon me, calling attention to the exorbitant demands that have been made upon them for rentals within the District. A number have come to see me who state that they will be compelled to leave their employment and return home because of the extortionate rates they are charged for housing by landlords in the city. A number of persons have also been to see me who have had contracts for apartments, the contracts terminating in July, August, September, and October of this year, but in not a single instance have they been able to get any assurance from the landlords of a renewal of the lease upon any terms whatever; indeed, the indication is that the landlords will wait until the last moment and then charge, as those who have come to me state, prices that would be prohibitive. I think unless legislation is speedily enacted that when autumn comes we will find the situation here intolerable.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That reminds me of one incident to which I wished to call attention, but which I overlooked. It was called to my attention a short time ago that some 10 or 15 young ladies who had come here to accept Government employment had rented a house, taken it collectively, at a certain rate. They had every reason to think that the amount agreed upon would be the permanent rent; they paid no yearly rental or anything of that kind, but they paid monthly rentals. A short time ago the landlord or the landlady came to them and stated that after 30 days or such a matter they would have to pay a certain amount, naming a very large sum, which these ladies did not see how they would be able to meet. Situations like that are coming up nearly every day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat, and that is whether this bill is intended to cover only rooming houses, apartment houses, or whether he will make it broad enough to cover even the hotels?

Let me say that there are a great many transients who have to come to the city of Washington, and it is rather a shame that they should have to pay 80 cents for a lemon if they go to one of these hotels. What I say is that absolute robbery has been practiced by our hotels, even worse than has been practiced by the rooming houses, and it does seem to me that we ought to protect the public.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I am not a member of the subcommittee that are framing this bill, so I do not know exactly the scope of the measure that they contemplate reporting to the full committee. I feel sure that they are going to try to cover the situation broadly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I sincerely hope they will.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know anything about these hotels that are charging 80 cents for a lemon, but I do know that there are good hotels in the city that have not raised their rates since the war began. They are good, nice hotels, too. As I said a while ago, I have engaged accommodations there for citizens of my State upon telegraphic request, and I find that they get rooms, and rooms and bath, at the same rate that they did before the war began. I have no hesitation in stating what those places are.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. SWANSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I took the floor, and I simply asked the Senator from Washington a question, and I desire to hold the floor for just a minute longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma, who, I think, was on his feet first.

Mr. OWEN. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to say one thing. We had before us yesterday the discussion of the Arlington Hotel site, and I made the suggestion that, as I understood, this property had been sold a short time ago for about $400,000. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] was very earnest in his denunciation of a statement of that kind, stating that the question refuted itself, because within his own knowledge this property, this hole in the ground, was worth somewhere about a million dollars, and that it could not have been offered for even $400,000 within the last twenty-odd years.

I took occasion this morning to call up by telephone a gentleman who has been more or less connected with the transactions concerning the changes in the ownership of this hotel property, and who is now bringing an action against the company which purposed to construct a hotel there some time ago; and he informs me that, as he understands the situation, it was sold to the Arlington Hotel Co. for about $350,000, and that was but a few years ago. This was for the land, before the hole was made in it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I can not speak by the card; but I have a strong impression, knowing some of the gentlemen who were connected with the enterprise originally, that they paid a million and a quarter dollars for the old Arlington Hotel and the site; that within a year, or about that time, it was foreclosed and taken at $800,000; but that it stood the original syndicate a million and a quarter dollars.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me correct the Senator as to the proceeding. It was first purchased by this company that was organized to build a new hotel. They tore down the old hotel building upon that site, as I am informed, and then proceeded to dig this hole in the lot. They squandered money in a way that would have made them the envy of the ordinary administrative board during this war period. In a short time the money that had been raised by the stockholders was squandered, and they had mortgaged the premises, or given a trust deed on the premises, for $800,000. That had nothing to do with the original purchase price. They put this trust deed on it for $800,000. Then a number of gentlemen from Richmond, Va., bought it in under foreclosure and accrued interest for $847,000. That included the lot and the hole. Then they proceeded to construct a hotel, or something of that character, and then turned it off onto the Government.

I do not know what the building is going to be worth, and therefore I have no information as to whether the Government has made a good bargain or a bad bargain. I simply wanted to state the information I had as to the original selling price to this company.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not follow the Senator in this respect: He says that, as he understands it, the property has recently been sold for $400,000. Now, somebody loaned $800,000 on it and took a trust deed, and it was foreclosed. That shows that those people thought it was worth $800,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why not?

Mr. McCUMBER. If I happened to own a lot that was worth $100,000, and I got in debt for $200,000, and I had no other security to give for the $200,000 than the lot which was worth $100,000, that would be no evidence whatever that the lot was worth $200,000; and that seems to have been the case here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume that the $800,000 was loaned on the property. If it was not, if they simply took the $800,000 mortgage on something that was not worth more than $400,000, I can follow the Senator on that; but where are his figures to show that the place was only worth $400,000 as a piece of property, irrespective of what the different syndicates have lost in trying to put up a new building there?

Mr. McCUMBER. Nothing more than the information which I received this morning that it was originally sold for about $350,000 to those who intended to construct a hotel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the Senator mean by "originally"—the old Arlington Hotel property that was owned by Mr. Eustis?

Mr. McCUMBER. After the building was taken off of it, and so on.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But Mr. Eustis got a million and a quarter dollars for that property with the hotel on it. Whether the purchasers paid too much for it or not I do not know.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am simply giving the information that I had in relation to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated once more?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will please state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Columbia," on line 21, page 7, it is proposed to add:

> Of which the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary therefor, shall be used by the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds to convert the building known as the Maltby House into an apartment house for occupancy by Members of the Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the last words, "for occupancy by Members of the Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I will eliminate that clause.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to the amendment if that clause is eliminated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply want to say about this particular building that I had committee rooms in that building at one time and enjoyed them very much, indeed, before I had an opportunity to get into the Capitol; but, to my surprise, afterwards the very official named in this amendment condemned the building. He made a report that it was not suitable for occupancy, that it was in a very dangerous condition, and the result was that everybody got out of it who could get out of it.

Mr. THOMAS. And the building still stands.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, I did not quite agree that it was unsafe; and I recall another illustration where a building was sacrificed in the same way. The Government is now constructing a building on the lot south of the Belasco Theater. A substantial brick building, used for office purposes, stood there, which I think, if it had been allowed to remain, might have remained there for a million years, unless it had been destroyed by fire or earthquake or something of that kind; but a Senator visiting that building at one time discovered a crack in the wall. He reported it to some official of the Government and that building was declared to be unsafe and pulled down, and that property has remained idle now, I guess, for fifteen or more years. In my judgment that building ought never to have been removed; but it was removed, and we lost the occupancy of it, and now the Government is going to spend a large amount of money in putting a new building on that site, which I think the Government ought to do.

So, in reference to the Maltby Building, I think that before $75,000 is spent on that building for any purpose the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, who made the report declaring it unsafe, ought either to verify his findings or else to admit that he was mistaken; one or the other.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just informed me that he occupied that building for office purposes for six years after it was condemned.

Mr. GALLINGER. After it was condemned? Very well.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds has made an estimate two or three times as to how the building could be made absolutely safe and at what cost, and it depends very largely upon the use to which the building is to be put. If it is improved for one purpose, the cost was estimated at, I think, only $32,000, and if for another purpose a larger amount was named. As I understand, the condemnation was not made by any official of the United States Government. It was made by somebody connected with the fire department of the District of Columbia. About that time there was an agitation going on for the construction of a new Senate Office Building, and it was thought by some that perhaps there was some influence exerted to have an additional reason to get a new building, and it was then thought to be doubtful whether the Maltby Building was a safe building.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, having had something to do with the construction of the new Senate Office Building, I will say that it is news to me that anybody interested in the construction of the new Office Building had anything to do with getting the Maltby Building condemned. The fact is that it was condemned, and my recollection is that the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds was the official who made a report saying that it was unsafe. Now, I suppose, if it was unsafe, that that meant that the foundations were insecure or that there was some very substantial change necessary to be made in it to make it safe, but on that point I have no definite information. My only thought was that if we are to spend $75,000 on that building—and I think we ought to spend enough money on it to make it tenantable—we ought at least to know before the money is expended that everything is safe or will be safe after the money has been expended. I apprehend that this appropriation is not intended to strengthen the building—it is not intended to make it more secure so far as its structure is concerned—and we ought not to throw away any money on it unless it will be entirely secure and safe after the appropriation has been expended.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will yield to me, I will state that my attention was called to this building first when I saw some effort to take out the windows, and I wondered whether or not the building was safe, and so I walked around the building. On the side of the building where there are no windows the walls were perfectly intact; there was no evidence at all that I could discover of any cracks in the walls, and it struck me as a very substantial building, because the weakness of a building is made very manifest on a back wall without windows, and when there were no cracks therein I came to the conclusion that it was a very substantial and safe building.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I wanted to emphasize was that I think we are getting into a bad habit in the District of Columbia, and perhaps that extends to other municipalities—I do not know how that may be—in feeling that we have got to pull down old buildings and construct new buildings; and I gave as an illustration the fact that that substantial brick building on the lot south of the Belasco Theater was torn down at a time when, according to my unintelligent judgment on matters of building, it was absolutely safe, and was answering a useful purpose, because, as I remember, the Attorney General's office was in it at that time.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is correct. The Department of Justice was in that building, and I was there repeatedly, and it was a good, substantial building.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that I was a Member of the House of Representatives at the time that building was authorized to be torn down. I had been in the building a number of times, but there was agitation at that time of the construction of a new building for the Department of Justice on that very site, and the question was mooted, and it was rumored that this report condemning the building had something to do with influencing the attempted construction of a new building, and after it was torn down, then they failed to appropriate the money for that purpose for many years.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that over a year ago we appropriated money to allow the Treasury Department to build an annex on this very property right across from the Treasury Department, north of the Treasury Department, and provided for a tunnel under the street; and instead of going to work and building on that property, they are building over this hole in the ground on the Arlington property. If the Senator will allow me further, it is not so much the price that I complain of in respect to the Arlington property; it is the fact that we have other property, three squares of property, right below the Avenue, across from the Willard Hotel, and we have this property right near the Belasco Theater, where this building was torn down that was formerly occupied by the Department of Justice. This property remains vacant, unutilized, and they go on and take this hole in the ground, for God knows what reason.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, my concluding observation is that if it is a fact, as the Senator from Colorado suggests, that those who wanted a new building were instrumental in some way in getting the old building destroyed, it is a reflection upon Congress itself that Congress does not exercise sufficient care and supervision over these matters to determine whether or not a building ought to be pulled down for the purpose of constructing a new building on that site.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield; certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that I know nothing of the fact, except that there was a rumor current to that effect.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and the only point I wanted to make—I was absent when this matter was discussed until I came in a moment ago—was that if we are to make this appropriation for reconstructing in any way the so-called Maltby Building, we ought to satisfy ourselves to start with that the money will not be thrown away provided some official or other declares, after a little while, as some official did a few years ago, that that building is unsafe.

That is the only point I want to make about the matter. I think that building ought to be utilized. I have always agreed with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who has been insistent in that regard, that that building ought not to stand idle. It is a substantial building, constructed for a hotel, occupied as a hotel for some time, and afterwards taken over by the Government. Some of us had committee rooms there, and were satisfied with them; but all at once, like a flash out of a clear sky, the announcement was made that it was unsafe for human life to remain in that building, and the occupants got out of it as fast as they could.

Mr. THOMAS. And the building is still there.

PUTTING THE AMERICAN DOLLAR AT PAR ABROAD.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on Monday, April 22, 1918, appeared an ostentatious article with big headlines explaining "why the Federal Reserve Board allows United States currency to remain at a discount abroad, as explained by F. I. Kent." Mr. Kent delivered this speech before the National Foreign Trade Council at Cincinnati. Mr. Kent is in charge of the Foreign Exchange Division under the Federal Reserve Board. He is said to pass on all foreign exchange transactions. In this article Mr. Kent argues against putting the dollar at par. The article, in my opinion, in its argument that the dollar should remain at a discount abroad, is adapted to serve the German interests, because the effect of it is to prevent the American dollar buying its full value in neutral countries, and just to the extent that the American dollar is deprived of its purchasing power to that extent the taxes of the American people and their sacrifices in this war will be rendered abortive, unproductive, and useless.

If it is a good thing, as Mr. Kent thinks, that the dollar should be at 30 per cent discount, as it is at present in Spain, then it would be a better thing, according to Mr. Kent, to have it at 50 per cent discount, or at 60 per cent discount, and the bigger the discount the better for the American people. It is a "reductio ad absurdum." The argument is false and serves Germany's interest.

Mr. Kent is posed in the press as a scientific expositor on foreign exchange and as a man "in high authority." I have carefully examined his article, which opens with the following paragraph:

> The cry of the orator for a dollar at par throughout the world may be valuable in time of peace as commercial propaganda, but it has no place in time of war, particularly with a world's war, such as exists to-day.

Among others I have been crying "for a dollar at par," as the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate. A dollar at par abroad is just as important as a dollar at par at home, precisely in degree to the American business involved.

Mr. Kent's advice is injuring America, and thereby serving Germany, and on behalf of the American people—whatever the good purposes of the adviser—I denounce the advice as hostile to the interests of America.

Keeping the pound sterling at par "has a place" in Great Britain's policy.

Keeping the India rupee at par "has a place" in East India policy, and the United States Senate and House of Representatives passed a bill, at the request of the Treasury Department, to melt 350,000,000 of silver dollars, among other things, to preserve the parity of British currency in India, which German propaganda was deliberately trying to break down.

The advice of foreign exchange expert, Mr. Kent, that the cry of a dollar at par has no place in time of war I shall answer, and will show the utter fallacy of his arguments, which are so misleading and so certain to injure America.

Any man who argues against doing what reasonably lies within our power to put the American dollar at par is giving advice injurious to the United States, even if he be in charge of the Foreign Exchange Division under the Federal Reserve Board. The National Foreign Trade Council needs better advice than it got at Cincinnati from Mr. Kent. The United States Treasury needs a new set of advisers, because their advisers are advising against the interests of the people of the United States, and I am not willing to be silent when this injury to America is being perpetrated.

The President of the United States is in favor of keeping the dollar at par, notwithstanding Mr. Kent.

The Secretary of the Treasury is in favor of keeping the dollar at par, notwithstanding Mr. Kent.

The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Leffingwell, is in favor of keeping the dollar at par, notwithstanding Mr. Kent, and the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate and the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives are both in favor of keeping the dollar at par.

The obvious reason why the dollar should be kept at par is that we are compelled to buy many necessities for ourselves, as well as for our allies, of neutrals, and to that extent we must, in making war purchases, have our dollar buy as much as possible, and not as little as possible. Any person of good sense might understand this unless his brain had become hopelessly confused in the tangle of his excessive knowledge as an expert.

Let us examine this expert's advice. The first argument made by Mr. Kent is as follows:

> The United States, in order to carry out her part in the war, is going to be obliged to supply from her own resources and from those of many other countries of the world commodities to the value of many billions of dollars. Regardless of her great wealth, there is a positive limit to her ability to furnish such supplies. In order to win the war she must be in a position to do so for a longer period than the enemy. The length of time that she can continue to furnish needed supplies will depend upon her ability to conserve her resources.

And Mr. Kent thinks we can conserve our resources by selling gold dollars in Spain for 60 cents, instead of selling them for a dollar.

The simple truth is that to the extent we are required to buy from neutral countries we should control the shipments from them to our actual necessities, and this we can do under the existing law. We can and do control our exports in like manner under existing law. Great Britain and France do the same. And France, who has borrowed funds from Spain at 7 per cent to meet her balances there, sets a suitable example to Great Britain to do the same thing.

It is better for Great Britain and France, and for the United States, for that matter, to pay 3 or 4 per cent interest above the normal rate than it is to pay a 40 per cent discount, and anybody should be able to see this, especially a person engaged in conserving the resources of the United States, which Mr. Kent so anxiously desires to do. It is better to pay 6 per cent or 7 per cent or 8 per cent in Spain for money or on Spanish balances here rather than to compel our importers to pay 30 and 40 per cent for money in Spain. It comes back immediately upon our own consumers. It comes back upon them with the merchant's profit added. Great Britain understands this perfectly well, and so does France, and both of them are making strenuous efforts to place credits in Spain for the purpose of putting their own currency more nearly at par; and an attempt is being made now by the Treasury Department, on our behalf, to do the same thing. In other words, the Treasury Department is trying to do now what Mr. Kent, the Treasury expert, argues it is against our interest to do. They are trying to put the dollar at par, and Mr. Kent is arguing before the country that its dollar ought to be at a discount.

Mr. Kent argues that our interest and that of our allies demands that we maintain such commercial relations as will enable us to continue the purchase of neutral commodities constantly for a long period. And he argues in consequence that by this system—

> We will also be helping to keep the countries with which we trade in a healthier financial condition, which should be of great benefit in helping us to find a market for our goods when the war is over. * * *.

Selling Spain American dollars at 60 cents on the dollar would certainly serve to keep Spain in a healthier financial condition, but at our expense, and at our serious expense. It is unpardonable to permit our gold dollar to be at 40 per cent discount. It is shameful to the United States, and I shall not submit to it if I can help it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The proposition which is made is, it seems to me, so absolutely void of any reason, that I should like to know whether Mr. Kent gives any other reason.

Mr. OWEN. I shall put the article in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I invite Senators to read it. It is absolutely shameful and disgusting. It has no argument in it worthy of the name.

Yet this man as an expert of the United States Treasury goes out and addresses a great convention of business men in the United States to persuade them that the dollar should be kept at a discount. The President wants our dollar at par; the Secretary of the Treasury wants it at par, and this alleged expert argues against having it at par. As the Senator from Colorado said, there can be no reason why the dollar of the United States, a dollar worth par in gold, should be selling at 60 cents on the dollar in Spain. There is no just reason for it. It is because the dollars we have loaned to our allies have been used in large part to meet the trade balances due to Spain for the Spanish commodity shipments to Great Britain and France, and because our own purchases here by our own importers compel our people, our importers, to have a certain limited number of pesetas, and the banks control the supply of commercial bills in pesetas and are speculating upon them and compel our importers to pay any price that they please. That is the reason of it. It is all right from the bankers' standpoint, but it is highly offensive to a good American.

It is argued that the United States will find it advisable to curtail its exports to neutral countries and to hold our imports within reasonable limits, and says:

> An adverse exchange rate is the key to such force, and is a great regulator of trade. It puts such difficulties in the way of our imports that without other pressure we endeavor to do without them in so far as possible.

Certainly if our gold dollar buys 60 cents' worth in Spain, our merchants do regard it as a serious difficulty, because they must impose this excess charge on Spanish commodities on their own consumers, with the merchants' profit in addition. It is a very serious difficulty, obstructing trade, interfering with legitimate commerce. It is precisely for this reason that such a difficulty should be removed, and imports and exports controlled by our other mechanism provided by law by means of a license system. We provided for that by a license system.

To argue that this obvious evil is a benefit because it is a means of preventing Americans from buying their necessities is illogical and senseless. The things they are obliged to have they will buy at the market cost. The purchase and sale of things nonessential to war can be and has been stopped by the license mechanism otherwise provided by law.

The discredited American gold dollar puts the United States in the attitude of having its currency dishonored and its financial credit abroad impaired. It gives psychological encouragement to the German and psychological discouragement to the allies. It has no commercial sense in it for the reason that just as France borrowed money from Spain at 7 per cent—3 per cent above the normal—and to that extent avoided the tax, we could borrow and avoid the tax we pay of 40 per cent on imports. It is better to pay 3 per cent per annum than 40 per cent with each turnover. The merchant keenly feels this. A bank expert does not. His class profits on fluctuating high exchange rates.

Mr. Kent's article emphasizes the fact that the Federal Reserve Board, through its Division of Foreign Exchange, knows the exact cash balances each Wednesday night which every country in the world has in the United States, and he states that the neutral countries are putting heavy balances into the United States. If this is true, then these balances have been transferred to the United States by bankers by the sale of credits acquired in neutral countries—by the sale of their commodities, payable in terms of their own money—and the New York bankers may sell such pesetas at a high rate to merchants compelled to compete injuriously for such pesetas or kroner or guilders. I would discourage this profiteering. Mr. Kent's advice would encourage it. I look at the problem from the viewpoint of the importer, exporter, consumer, and producer. The banking expert looks at the problem from the opposite side. His class profits on fluctuating exchange.

Moreover, the neutral countries are voluntarily sending their balances to America, which is the only thing required to bring the dollar immediately to par if sufficiently encouraged, but Mr. Kent is opposed to encouraging the putting of the dollar at par, if his general thesis be correct. While it is to our obvious advantage, as Mr Kent says, to encourage these countries to put their balances in the United States, what becomes of Mr. Kent's argument that it is to our advantage to keep the dollar below par when he would encourage these balances which would bring the dollar to par. The one argument contradicts the other.

We can put the dollar to par in several different ways.

First, by forbidding the sale of pound sterling for dollars and compelling the Spanish merchants to buy dollars with pesetas. And this only means limiting arbitrage until the dollar reaches par.

Second. We may accomplish it by placing United States bonds payable in pesetas in Spain, and thus buy pesetas necessary to meet the urgent, though limited, demand of our importers.

Third. We can accomplish it by encouraging what Mr. Kent says is taking place without encouragement. That is, encouraging foreign banks to keep balances in the United States at interest, and we can afford to pay them 6 per cent or 7 per cent for such balances, rather than compel our merchants to pay 40 per cent for exchange and the customer in the United States 40 to 50 per cent for commodities.

Moreover, if the dollar was at par; if the policy of the United States was to keep the dollar at par, these balances of neutral countries would greatly expand, because then foreign bankers would know that they would not suffer any loss in the future by the depreciation of the American dollar by this adverse exchange. When they know that they will get their principal back with interest in terms of their own currency at par they will deposit their balances here more readily.

Fourth. We can bring the American dollar to par by imposing an extra tax on goods required by Spain, putting the export tax at the currency rate of the exchange, whatever it is. It would not take Spain long to discover the wisdom of exchanging pesetas for dollars at par, but I do not believe in such a friction-arousing policy.

Fifth. Another way to put the dollar at approximate par is by negotiating with the Government of Spain, with the cooperation of France and Great Britain, and seeking their just treatment as a matter of amity and commercial decency. This, however, would require a constant series of negotiations, and while of value, is not of as much value as using the absolute power which we have to require commercial justice through the regulation of individual transactions.

It will be remembered we put upon the finance-corporation bill a provision that those bonds might be issued in terms of foreign money, and we put in the third liberty-loan bill that the bonds of the United States might be issued in terms of foreign money, so that a person acquiring those bonds in foreign countries would know he would get his principal and interest back without the discount of an adverse exchange rate. Congress did that very thing for the purpose of bringing the dollar to par, showing that the Senate of the United States desires to put the dollar at par, that both Houses desire to put it at par, and yet this expert of the Treasury is advising the bankers of the United States and argues in favor of keeping the dollar at a discount.

The Congress of the United States expressly authorized the President of the United States not only to embargo gold and silver, if desirable, but also to embargo credits; and when we put an embargo on the sale of dollars for pound sterling and compel Spain to buy the dollars she requires of us with pesetas, thus giving us pesetas in exchange for these dollars, we have an immediate remedy without dealing unjustly in the slightest degree with Great Britain.

Because Spain imported from us last year $92,000,000 of goods and we imported from her only $36,000,000, she owed us on a net balance $55,000,000. Yet the American dollar has come to so low a level that it only brings 60 cents in Spain, when, in point of fact, if we compelled Spain to buy her dollars from us exclusively we could make a dollar worth 60 per cent above par, because she is obliged to have our dollars.

Our loans to our allies have been injuriously, if not wrongfully, used against us. On May 21, 1917, in Des Moines, Iowa, Hon. W. G. McAdoo delivered at a meeting of business men and bankers of Iowa an address, in which he explained that the loans already authorized to be made our allies of $3,000,000,000—and that was enough to consume our credit trade balance for that year—would go to "five billions or six billions," and said in relation to the bond issue: "This money is not going to be taken out of the country. All of this financing is largely a matter of shifting credits; it is not going to involve any loss of gold; it is not going to involve any loss of values," and so forth.

The money was taken out by hundreds of millions. We shipped, I understand, 80,000,000 gold dollars to Spain last year, through London. Spain owed us $55,000,000. We let Great Britain have that $55,000,000 to pay Spain, and we furnished $88,000,000 more of our gold to pay British balances due Spain; and on top of that our dollar has been permitted to go to a tremendous discount, and every dollar we buy now is costing our consumers 50 per cent more than it ought. In our normal purchases in Spain it would cost us one-half of $36,000,000, or $18,000,000, per annum. In that one country there is a great net loss to America. Is that to the advantage of the United States in a great war? It is against the interests of the United States, it is in the interest of Germany, and I object to it most seriously. I filed my objection in the Treasury Department. I argued this matter before the Federal Reserve Board, with Mr. Kent present, and Mr. Kent told me to my face it is better for the dollar to be at a discount. That argument was made in the Federal Reserve Board room; afterwards I presented the answer fully on the floor of the Senate. To have this expert go out in the United States carrying on a false propaganda is unendurable and ought not to be permitted by the Government of the United States.

The money was taken out by hundreds of millions, involving loss of gold and of values, and then Congress passed an act authorizing the President to control the sale of dollars or transfer of credits. The President put the power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury by his proclamation of October 12, 1917, and Mr. McAdoo trusts it, apparently, to Mr. Kent, who now seriously argues against keeping the dollar at par, as the President and the Secretary of the Treasury desire, and as the Congress desires it shall be done.

We must stand by our allies, and we can do so and still protect the dignity of our own currency. We ought to protect the American dollar, and as economically as possible. We can be as generous as we please with our allies and still preserve the honor and dignity of the American dollar.

What was the anxiety shown by the British Government a few days ago when an appeal was made to us for $350,000,000 of silver? It was to keep the rupee at par. Did Great Britain think it important? She thought it vital. The rupee was being put below par by a well-organized German propaganda in India. I will not stand for any propaganda to put the American dollar below par for this country; I do not care what the motive of the man is, and I assume, indeed, I am glad to believe, that his motives are not bad. I do not think his motives are necessarily bad. I merely think that he lacks common sense.

If necessary for us to borrow from these neutral countries, who are without effort placing their balances here and paying them a high rate, 6 per cent, 7 per cent, it would only be 2 or 3 per cent margin per annum on enough money from the Spanish banks to pay for our imports from Spain at par, whereas Mr. Kent would advise us to pay 40 per cent discount on our goods shipped from Spain as a means of winning the war. It is bad advice, and if Mr. Kent does not know better he ought to be retired. If he does really know better—and I do not think he does—he ought to be indicted for aiding the enemy.

It is a serious thing, putting the dollar at a discount. It is a very serious thing. Suppose the American dollar were to fall to a discount to-day in the United States, what would it mean? It would mean that every gold dollar would go in hiding. That is what it would mean. It would mean that every contract in the United States would be suddenly thrown upon a fictitious basis and dislocated. It would mean the most complete upset of all our business life. Every man knows that, and we have taken infinite pains to store up gigantic quantities of gold for the purpose of keeping the American dollar at par in the United States, so that everyone who deposits in our 25,000 banks should know that he can get his deposit in gold on demand. To say that the dollar should be at a discount abroad while it is at par at home has no logic, has no justification, and is mischievous in the highest degree.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am in full accord with the argument the Senator is making that our dollar ought to be kept at par. I am going to ask the Senator a question that is not directly related to the subject he is discussing, and that is why it is that the bonds the Government is issuing to the people of the country at the present time are not at par in the market?

Mr. OWEN. I think it is easily answered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have the reason given.

Mr. OWEN. I think it is easily answered. There are a great many people here really hard up themselves who borrowed money to buy bonds with, and after finding that there is a market demand by those who have currency available, those persons who are in difficulty offer their bonds for sale. That is all there is in it. They are willing to make the sacrifice and they do not carry them because they are hard up. That is all there is about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think the bonds that are being traded on in the New York market, as an illustration, come from that class of people?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to have the explanation, because it has been a rather troublesome question to me.

Mr. OWEN. There is, I think, no doubt about that. Of course, the Government has been urged to adopt the policy of undertaking to hold the market up by buying the bonds at par, but that is regarded by many prudent financiers as containing some very serious objections.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to add another reason, and that is that the money is worth more than the rate of interest that is being paid on the bonds. That has a tendency also to throw the bonds on the market, and when there is a greater amount of bonds offered than there are people to buy them it naturally depresses the bond value.

I will say also to the Senator that English bonds to-day at the rate they are selling to investors bring a better rate of interest than our bonds now that are selling at 97.80, I believe, to-day and drawing 4 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hark back to the bonds that were issued during the Civil War. They were issued at 3.65, I think, in a very large amount. They never were below par in the market, as I remember. On the contrary, they were always above par.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will remember in this connection that our greenbacks were below par.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And therefore the people preferred to have bonds rather than depreciated currency. With currency below par, gold is withdrawn from circulation, and that is what the Senator from Oklahoma referred to in his remarks a moment ago; and it will always happen that the dearer money will seek a hiding place.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. And the cheap money is always the money that enters into circulation.

Mr. OWEN. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. For that reason the man who held the bonds during the Civil War period that ultimately had to be paid by the Government of the United States in gold was not willing to dispose of them for currency at a depreciation of 40 and 50 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. Kent emphasizes the fact of the bank balances of neutral countries piling up in the United States; also that the neutral countries have stripped themselves of commodities to sell them at a high price to Germany, and they must after the war look to us for commodities. This is true; and it means that the normal demand for commodities from America after the war would give us the equivalent of probably in excess of an annual commodity trade balance of a thousand million dollars. In addition to this will come interest charges from Europe amounting to a half billion more, and in addition to this will come the mercantile marine freight credits of American ships, so that America may be expected to have a flow of balances due her amounting to two or three billion dollars per annum after the war is over.

All of these neutrals will need their trade balances then in the United States, and they need, and they know they need, them now to begin the arranging of credits in America to supply them with needed commodities after the war, for America will be in a position to control commodities all over the world because of the balances which will be due her.

Mr. Kent does not see that these facts comprise an overwhelming argument why the dollar should go to par and stay at par, because the necessity of the world for the American dollar will be gigantic. We have the right to anticipate their needs for this dollar and place our own bonds abroad and invite neutral balances here. Indeed, our trade balance last year was $3,000,000,000. That must be paid with dollars, or commodities, or gold, or securities. Indeed, it forms the basis upon which the American dollar would go to a premium if it were permitted to do so, which we ought not to allow, however, as the dollar should be used as a standard measure of value, never varying, utterly dependable, the standard of value throughout the world, if we want our country to be the financial center of the world.

The bankers should not be permitted to tamper with our financial yardstick, even if they do profit by it or profiteer by it, as I verily believe some of them are doing now; I hope not with Mr. Kent's knowledge.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying, and I think it would be good if the American people generally understood the situation. I wish the Senator would also add to his remarks that it is not only the banks in Spain that are profiting by a depreciated United States currency, but speculators, and the speculator to-day is making all the way from 20 to 25 and 30 per cent on every dollar of foreign-currency bills that he can secure.

Mr. OWEN. I have no doubt that is the case, but we ought not to allow a condition to remain where this kind of thing can be done at the expense of the American people. That is the point I am making.

Mr. Kent justifies our gold embargo and enlarges upon our exact knowledge of balances held by neutral countries in America. This is the end of the argument of Mr. Kent in telling why the Reserve Board allows United States currency to remain at a discount. His alleged explanation of three columns is no explanation whatever. It explains nothing. And the laudatory headlines of the article, with its boast that it is a scientific exposition is utterly inaccurate but very serviceable as a piece of propaganda. He makes no adequate or convincing explanations whatever to justify keeping the dollar at a discount.

The utterly fallacious argument has been made that while importers lost heavily exporters gained.

That argument appears on page 158 of the Federal Reserve Bulletin of March 1, 1918. As a matter of fact, an exporter neither gains nor loses. A man who takes a thousand dollars' worth of goods from New York to Barcelona gets his $1,000, and if he pays the freight and commission he gets his freight and commission back and $1,000. If he gets 3 pesetas for a dollar he immediately sells his pesetas for dollars and gets the dollars back, and it comes out the same $1,000; and that is all there is of that.

As a matter of fact, in a country where the currency is depreciated workmen are temporarily paid less and goods are made for less and exports are stimulated by this fact of the goods being made cheaper at the expense of labor.

That is an old truism in the doctrine of international exchanges, explained by various writers, and a school boy who has studied international exchange knows about it. But this is a transitory matter and has no relation to the United States because the dollar in the United States has not depreciated. Labor is not underpaid in the United States; goods are not selling below a normal profit in the United States. The contrary is true of Germany. German labor is underpaid, her currency at home has depreciated, and she is making goods cheaper than they can be made in Sweden, but at the expense of her own German workmen, and Germany is thus underselling the manufacturers in Sweden. Sweden is on the point of passing a tariff act to exclude that advantage over Swedish manufacturers gained by Germany at the expense of the poor, underpaid German workmen. While that appears in the Federal Reserve Bulletin, it affords no justification in keeping the American dollar at a discount because we gain no advantage in exports.

Mr. Kent is advertised as having complete control of all foreign-exchange transactions. If he had exercised the powers given to the President and restricted the transfer of United States credits abroad, the American dollar would have been at par now. It can be brought to par within a very short time in most of the neutral countries.

It is perfectly plain to any man who will follow this with the least attention. If we forbid the sale of dollars for pounds sterling, then the only way Spain can get dollars from us to pay her $92,000,000 of bills to us is to buy dollars from our market by the sale of her commercial bills in payment for shipment from the United States to Spain. Spain would have, then, to buy $92,000,000 worth of dollars from us, less our purchases of $36,000,000 of commodities from Spain.

Mr. SMOOT. Or send gold for it.

Mr. OWEN. Or send gold for it, and therefore our dollars would immediately go to par. They would go to par inside of a week. Congress gave that power to the President, and he gave it to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury gave it to Mr. Kent, and Mr. Kent advises us now not to do it, notwithstanding the President wants it done and Congress wants it done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will pardon me, I ought to have understood his statement concerning Mr. Kent, but I was engaged otherwise. Will he state who Mr. Kent is?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. Kent has charge of the foreign-exchange business of the Federal Reserve Board, and he visés the transfers of credits from the United States. Congress authorized the President to control the transfer of credits from the United States. The President authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to discharge this function. The Secretary put Mr. Kent in charge, and Mr. Kent tells us it is better not to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. So Mr. Kent in a sense speaks officially; that is, he is an official of the Government?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; he is supposed to speak officially; but I insist that he is misrepresenting the officers who are in control of that department. I am satisfied from what he has said to me that the Secretary of the Treasury wants to put the dollar at par.

The Spanish Government in 1916, finding that there was danger of Spanish credits and Spanish commodities migrating from Spain to furnish the sinews of war to the belligerents, passed an act prohibiting the placing in Spain foreign or Spanish securities except with the approval of the council of ministers. I wish, without reading, to put the Spanish royal decree and act of the Cortez in the RECORD for the information of Senators. I will not take the time to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Translation.]

ROYAL DECREE.

In accordance with the council of ministers, I hereby authorize the minister of finance to present in the Cortes a project of law prohibiting the introduction into Spain of foreign securities without the authorization of the Government.

Given in the royal palace this 14th day of June, 1916.

ALFONSO.

The Minister of Finance, Santiago Alba, to the Cortes:

The abnormal conditions controlling the economic life of all countries in consequence of the present European war demand in our own country, as in others, the adoption of measures of an exceptional character to prevent, as far as feasible, the emigration of Spanish funds to the detriment of the development of national wealth, and the withdrawal from the State of the means for carrying out, at the proper moment, such credit operations as may be demanded by public interests.

Bearing these considerations in mind, and without forgetting that measures of this nature must always have such elasticity as may permit the Government to alter them as the case and circumstances may demand, the undersigned minister, in accord with the council of ministers and with His Majesty's authorization, has the honor to submit to the deliberation of the Cortes the following

PROJECT OF LAW.

Article 1. After the promulgation of the present law, and until a date which shall be fixed by decree agreed upon at a council of ministers, there shall be prohibited: Announcing, issuing, putting in circulation or for sale, pawning or introducing in the Spanish market securities of the debt and other legal tenders of foreign governments, as well as stocks, obligations, or titles of any kind of companies or corporations not Spanish.

Nevertheless, on the proposal of the minister of finance, the council of ministers shall be able to grant, in respect to provisions in the preceding paragraph, the exemptions he may judge proper.

Article 2. The Government likewise, on the proposal of the minister of finance, may prohibit the introduction into Spain of Spanish securities, of corporations or societies, also Spanish, whenever these stocks are domiciled abroad. Those who desire to introduce them are hereby obliged to report to the Government as to such introduction and destination.

Article 3. The violation of the present law shall be punished with a fine of 1,000 to 10,000 pesetas, and in case of repetition, with a fine of from 10,000 to 25,000 pesetas.

Article 4. The minister of finance will dictate the proper orders for the execution of this law.

Madrid, June 14, 1916.

SANTIAGO ALBA,
The Minister of Finance.

Mr. OWEN. It was precisely the same principle which caused Congress, as a war measure, to pass the trading with the enemy act, approved October 6, 1917; among other things the act providing—

That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange, export or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form (other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States), and transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy, or otherwise, or between resident of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States; and he may require any such person engaged in any such transaction to furnish, under oath, complete information relative thereto, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters, or other papers in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed.

Why? For the very reason that I have mentioned, so as to prevent credits migrating from the United States, unjustly and unfairly to us, and putting our dollar below par abroad.

It was the same principle that caused Congress to pass the espionage act, approved June 15, 1917, which among other things provides—

SECTION 1. Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from or ship from or take out of the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation, except at such time or times, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

On October 12, 1917, the President vested in the Secretary of the Treasury the control of foreign exchange, exporting, gold transfer, credits, etc., in the following terms:

I hereby vest in the Secretary of the Treasury the executive administration of any investigation, regulation, or prohibition of any transaction in foreign exchange, export, or earmarking of gold or silver coin, or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form (other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States, and transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States; and I hereby vest in the Secretary of the Treasury the authority and power to require any person engaged in any such transaction to furnish under oath complete information relative thereto, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters, or other papers in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed.

At the same time the President vested in the War Trade Board the authority to issue licenses for exports or imports in paragraphs 2 and 3 of his Executive order of October 12, 1917, in the following language:

I hereby vest in said board the power and authority to issue licenses under such terms and conditions as are not inconsistent with law, or to withhold or refuse licenses, for the exportation of all articles, except coin, bullion, or currency, the exportation or taking of which out of the United States may be restricted by proclamations heretofore or hereafter issued by me under said Title VII of the espionage act.

I further hereby vest in said War Trade Board the power and authority to issue, upon such terms and conditions as are not inconsistent with law, or to withhold or refuse, licenses for importation of all articles the importation of which may be restricted by any proclamation hereafter issued by me under section 2 of the trading-with-the-enemy act.

The President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the best bankers, and various international experts with whom I have discussed this matter are convinced of the wisdom of maintaining the dollar at par. The only difficulty having been the means by which to accomplish it. I regard it as grossly unbecoming in Mr. Kent to attempt to create public opinion in favor of keeping the dollar below par. Such conduct I regard as disloyal and insubordinate to the President's wishes and deserving a stern rebuke. Mr. Kent should devote his knowledge in suggesting and perfecting plans by which the dollar could be put at par and the Reserve Board and the Treasury Department officials should find a means of thus protecting American interests, and Mr. Kent's conduct in going before the National Foreign Trade Council and attempting to mislead public opinion I regard as very reprehensible.

In my judgment the Secretary of the Treasury should dismiss Mr. Kent from office as unfit to advise the Treasury Department of the United States. It is this kind of advice, the advice of the banker who thinks in terms of interest, or profit and of commissions, that is calculated to mislead the Government officers.

Some banks profit by fluctuating exchange rates, and some banks profit by speculating in exchange rates, by acquiring foreign credits at a low rate and selling them to our merchants who are compelled to have foreign credits in foreign currency at a high rate. The bankers, however, should not prevail over our importers and consumers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, alluding to Mr. Kent, I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he has knowledge as to whether or not any member of the Federal Reserve Board indorses Mr. Kent's views? It has been suggested, or at least I have heard it suggested, that at least one member of the Federal Reserve Board was in harmony with Mr. Kent.

Mr. OWEN. I think that the influences surrounding Mr. Kent have been persuasive with some members of the board. I should not like to quote their names, unless they wish to put themselves on record with regard to it; but I think one or two members of the board have been led to that belief; and it is perfectly obvious that they have been grossly misled.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not wish to mention any name myself, but it has been suggested to me that such is the fact.

Mr. OWEN. I think it is the fact. That is the reason why I regard this advice as particularly mischievous, because the members of the Federal Reserve Board who have lived only within our domestic lines, who have not been engaged in international banking, and who have had no particular reason to have studied this matter, necessarily would rely upon such alleged expert advice; I should not be inclined to blame them for accepting the opinion of a man whom they regard as very high authority; but when I see the advice is wrong I feel it my duty to the country to speak out and show why it is wrong, because it is injuring American interests in this war, and I do not think we ought to permit it.

I submit a statement of the exports and imports from the neutral countries of Europe with the United States, showing a net balance due us of about $200,000,000 last year. These balances must increase because those countries have denuded themselves in large measure in supplying the belligerents around them, and they have to call on us more and more for supplies.

Balance of trade in the commerce of the United States with the neutral countries of Europe during the calendar year 1917.

Countries.	Imports.	Exports.	Excess of—
			Imports	Exports.
Denmark	$977,453	$32,388,864		$31,411,411
Netherlands	22,744,504	90,520,301		67,775,797
Norway	6,280,233	62,863,850		56,583,617
Spain	36,881,630	92,469,320		55,587,690
Sweden	18,039,487	20,900,854		2,831,367
Switzerland	19,834,068	19,502,045	$332,023

The international credit trade balances to the neutral countries of Europe were large, and they received in lieu thereof gold and credit and securities, the securities being merely a form of credit. The Government of the United States can control both imports and exports under the law. It can, as far as the neutral countries are concerned, immediately bring the dollar to par, because they owe us more than we owe them, and we only need to require them to buy the dollars they owe us in terms of their own currency to give the American consumers the benefit through their merchants of foreign currency at par.

Inducing the foreign banks to place their balapces in the United States directly is another way to do it to accomplish the same end.

Selling United States bonds in these neutral countries is another way to accomplish it.

All of these factors should be employed and through every available agency the dollar should be brought to par and kept at par as a means of helping us win this war.

I ask permission to put the article of Mr. Kent into the RECORD, without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New York American, Apr. 22, 1918.]

WHY RESERVE BOARD ALLOWS UNITED STATES CURRENCY TO REMAIN AT DISCOUNT ABROAD EXPLAINED BY F. I. KENT—TELLS CINCINNATI CONVENTION THAT BENEFITS BOTH NOW AND AFTER THE WAR WILL RESULT FROM POLICY—HINT TO CHILE FOR CREDITS.

Attention has been so intensely centered on the increasing discount to which the dollar has been falling abroad that an explanation of the international financial position of the United States at this moment is of wide interest. More so, if this explanation comes from one in high authority. The following simple and yet almost scientific exposition of the foreign exchange relations of this country was given in a speech by Fred I. Kent before the National Foreign Trade Council at its convention just closed at Cincinnati. Mr. Kent is in charge of the Foreign Exchange Division under the Federal Reserve Board. He passes on all foreign exchange transactions, and in his hands is concentrated the stupendous task of seeing that no funds pass out of the country into enemy hands. This requires examination of an immense number of drafts and papers. But it also places in his hands information invaluable to the country while at war. Why certain of our exchanges have been allowed to depreciate is fully explained by Mr. Kent. He also outlines the general policy with regard to our giving aid to strengthen allied exchange rates in other countries.

[By Fred I. Kent in his speech before the National Foreign Trade Council.]

The cry of the orator for a dollar at par throughout the world may be valuable in time of peace as commercial propaganda, but it has no place in time of war, particularly with a world's war, such as exists to-day.

The United States in order to carry out her part in the war, is going to be obliged to supply from her own resources and from those of many other countries of the world commodities to the value of many billions of dollars. Regardless of her great wealth, there is a positive limit to her ability to furnish such supplies. In order to win the war she must be in a position to do so for a longer period than the enemy. The length of time that she can continue to furnish needed supplies will depend upon her ability to conserve her resources. There are many products which she can obtain from within her own territory that will outlast the war needs. There are many others, however, which need supplementing from other countries of the world if we would maintain the highest efficiency of the war engines which we produce and of the men who operate them.

OUR BEST COURSE.

Our greatest interest, therefore, and that of our allies, demands that we maintain such commercial relations with the neutral countries which have commodities that will be needed by us as will enable the United States to continue the purchase of such commodities constantly for a long period. While there are probably none of these commodities which we can not (if need be) develop substitutes for, yet if we can continue their purchase from other countries, partly in exchange for things which we can better spare than the articles received for them, we will have accomplished two most important results—we will have maintained our foreign trade with other nations and so have held their interest in this country, and we will have saved the time of that portion of our population which might otherwise have had to be engaged in creating and manufacturing substitutes, in work that will result to our greater advantage. We will also be helping to keep the countries with which we trade in a healthier financial condition, which should be of great benefit in helping us to find a market for our goods when the war is over and our manufacturing interests turn from war industries.

MUST CURTAIL EXPORTS.

As the war goes on, the United States will find that it will have to curtail its exports to neutral countries, as Great Britain, France, and Italy have been obliged to do, so that it is reasonable to suppose that the balance of trade with many neutral countries will be constantly against us throughout the war. This being true, and it being greatly to the advantage of neutral countries to have our market for their goods continue in as large a way as possible, we must have some strong force to hold our imports within reasonable limits. An adverse exchange rate is the key to such force and is a great regulator of trade. It puts such difficulties in the way of our imports that without other pressure we endeavor to do without them in so far as possible.

The countries of export, in order to keep a market for their goods, will strive to find ways to allow continuation of such exports as we must have, even to the point of allowing funds to pile up in this country or through the extension of credits.

FUNDS ACCUMULATE.

As funds accumulate here which can not be exported there will be an increasing tendency on their part to purchase commodities from this country with them, which will offer a great inducement to the people of the United States to strive along with their war work to pay a part of their accumulating indebtedness through current exports.

In Argentina, for instance, we find that for the protection of its people the Argentine Government considered it to its very great interest to make an arrangement with the United States under which Argentine funds would be left on deposit in this country until after the war, provided the disbursement of the equivalent in Argentina was made for exports from Argentina to the United States. It is also true that the exports from the United States to Argentina increased from $76,874,258 in 1916 to $107,641,905 in 1917, even though we were not at war in the first year and were at war in the second. As long as exchange continues against us with Argentina the same tendencies will continue active, and when the war is over we will be as much less in debt to Argentina as the amount of exports which we have been able to furnish her year by year, that have been withdrawn from this country by her in order to get her funds home and make it possible, together with the extension of such credits as she can afford, to keep our market for her goods open.

AS TO ARGENTINE WOOL.

On our part we have, for instance, been induced to conserve and increase our supply of wool, so as to be able to import less from Argentina. As a result as the war goes on, we can hope to keep our relations with Argentina in such position that she will look upon us as being a country of great value to her, and, further, that she will accept us as her banker, so to speak, in that her surplus funds made through her war profits will have been accumulated in this country only to a natural extent, and not to such tremendous sums that she will become concerned for their safety or in actual need of them. The exchange rate being against us and acting as a deterrent to our imports and a stimulant to our exports will have helped to preserve a natural and proper relationship of benefit to both countries, in so far as is possible while the requirements of war exist. There is also excellent reason to believe that after the war is over, Argentina may prefer in large part our commodities to our gold, and that she will desire to continue the banking relationship which she has established.

In Chile a similar condition exists, with one or two minor differences. Our present demand for nitrate, which Chile alone is able to supply in large quantities, has seemingly made us more or less dependent upon her; and the exchange rate, being against us, might appear to be entirely in her favor. Actually this has not proved to be true and will clearly be less so as time goes on. If Chile is to hold our market for her nitrate, it is to her interest that we be deterred from establishing plants to manufacture nitrate from the air to the same extent that has been done in Germany. If she would do this, she must make some arrangement that will enable us to continue to import her nitrate without prohibitive expense or overextension. That this situation is becoming more clear to her people is shown in the fact that the price of nitrate has fallen off in recent months. Again we find that our exports to Chile increased in 1917, when we were at war, over 1916, when we were not at war, the figures, respectively, being $57,483,996 and $33,392,887.

In Spain the exchange is also against us, even though in this case the balance of trade has been in our favor. In 1907 we imported from Spain $36,881,630, whereas we exported to Spain goods to the value of $92,469,329. This difference was offset through two principal operations—first by the sale of sterling exchange in this country by Spain; and, second, by the sale by this country to South American countries of Spanish pesetas.

HELPING GREAT BRITAIN.

As Great Britain was not in position to furnish Spain with such commodities as she required, Spain transferred her sterling balances to the United States. The transfers were sufficiently large, together with other items, to force the exchange against us, which has resulted in greatly increasing the desire of Spain to import from the United States, and we find that such imports increased from $45,697,462 in 1915 to $64,316,888 in 1916, and to $92,469,320 in 1917. At the same time the operation was of great value to the allies, as it enabled Great Britain to obtain from Spain commodities required by her in France, which could be delivered without submarine loss. When selling pesetas to South America for the high prices obtained, we were helping pay for much-needed goods from those countries, and as they could be delivered to us without danger from submarines, it was to our greater interest, while such sales were being made, to import from South America and pay in pesetas than to import from Spain and pay in pesetas.

DOLLARS PILE UP.

The Spanish exchange having been against us has resulted in the piling up of dollars in this country to the credit of Spanish bankers, which has again, as has already been shown, produced a great demand for our exports. When the war is over, as the Spanish currency is nearly 100 per cent metal cover, there is good reason to believe that she will prefer to use such funds as may have accumulated by that time in this country for the purchase of our goods as she requires them, and that she will largely continue such of her balances here as may not be needed for this purchase.

We now come to a group of countries—the neutral countries adjacent to Germany—in all of which exchange rules against this country, and where in every case it is undoubtedly of great value to us. These countries are Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland. Taken as a whole, our exports to those countries have been over three times as great as our imports from them, and yet the exchange has ruled constantly against us for a long period. Exchange has been turned against us through the sale in the United States of sterling exchange and through the remittance to the neutral countries concerned of German money. The transfer of funds to these countries by Germany has been most detrimental to the allies, as it has enabled that country to pay for much-needed imports that she might otherwise have been unable to obtain in the desired quantities.

NEUTRAL MONEY HERE.

The purchase by this country of sterling exchange from all of the countries in this group has resulted in the accumulation in the United States of huge balances belonging to the banks of the neutral countries mentioned. As in the case of the other countries which we have considered, this caused a strong tendency to import from the United States, but after we entered the war and placed an embargo upon exports to such countries, except where we could feel reasonably certain that they would not prove of value to the enemy, such exports have been reduced. To Denmark, from $56,329,490 in 1916 to $32,388,864 in 1917; to Netherlands, from $113,730,162 in 1916 to $90,520,301 in 1917, to Norway, from $66,209,717 to $62,866,850; and to Sweden, from $47,967,590 to $20,900,854. To Switzerland there has been an increase, as shipments have been made to help obtain imports from that country to France. The figures were $13,654,256 in 1916 and $19,502,045 in 1917. As we were not at war the first three months of the year, these figures do not tell the whole story. As a result the balances maintained in the United States by these countries are very large.

In connection with transfers for German account, the accumulation of such balances and the difficulty involved in withdrawing them at the moment is of great value to the allies. The exchanges being high, it means that every successful transfer made for German account results in that country receiving a much smaller sum to be used in payment for imports in the country of destination. It also has greatly increased the difficulty of making such transfers at any rate, for, as balances continue to grow here, even loaning against them in the neutral countries concerned becomes more difficult. Even so, the need of Germany for funds in these countries is so great that we can not exercise too much vigilance in preventing their transfer.

Practically all of these countries are understood to have so stripped themselves of much-needed commodities in order to obtain the high prices being paid by Germany that after the war they will be obliged to replace them through import.

Their situation as to gold is also an easy one, so that we should be able to pay back these balances after the war without friction if we are prepared to supply the goods that these countries will require.

MAINTAIN STERLING.

All of these countries have increased the balance of exchange against us by selling drafts on London in the New York market. If it had not been for such sales the United States might have been justified in continuing the shipment of gold, because of the tremendous supply held by us.

When, however, we were taking over sterling credits which these nations sold to us, because we were helping maintain the sterling exchange rate, the accommodation was on our side and we were warranted in holding our gold until after the war, unless we should find it to our advantage to release it sooner. This is particularly true in the case of the neutral countries adjacent to Germany, where we have furnished them millions of dollars more in goods than they have given to us, and where we have taken sterling off their hands whenever they considered it to their interest to sell it in our market. Our gold embargo, therefore, is not in the nature of a refusal to pay. It is merely a statement to the world to this effect: That we do not at the moment propose to waste our gold by exchanging it for imports which we can get along without, and that neither do we propose to pay gold for sterling exchange which we are purchasing with dollar exchange at a higher rate than its normal value based on the present cash position of the British Government with the rest of the world, but in thus conserving our gold until after the war we are holding it as a reserve against the deposits which are accumulating in the United States to the credit of the other countries of the world.

EXACT BALANCES KNOWN.

In the meantime we will allow such balances to be used as freely as may be desired for the purchase of such goods in this country as the exigencies of the war justify us in allowing to be exported, or through investment in securities or property of any other kind in this country.

In this connection it will interest you to know that the Federal Reserve Board, through its Division of Foreign Exchange, is in possession of the exact cash balance as it exists at the close of business each Wednesday night between the United States and every country of the world. It is also in possession of exact knowledge as to what causes the changes in such balances from week to week. As these figures develop, the position of our country to the world will be as clearly before the Federal Reserve Board as is that of a banker to his depositors. This will make it possible for us to apply a banker's knowledge to the question of the probable demands that will be made upon us from time to time and so enable us to determine how they may best be met. There will be no need for leaping in the dark, but every problem as arises can be considered from the scientific basis of complete understanding of the situation as a whole as it develops, and if we prove ourselves wise custodians of the world's money we can hope to remain as the world's bankers for many a year to come.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read the amendment now pending, as I have changed it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. The bill reads, in section 8, page 7, line 18, as follows:

Provided, That $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount hereby authorized shall be used to build or acquire, as herein provided, housing accommodations within the District of Columbia.

Mr. THOMAS proposes to add, after the words "District of Columbia," the following:

, of which the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary therefore, shall be used by the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Buildings and Grounds to convert the building known as the Maltby Building into an apartment house or for office purposes.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think that amendment is right, and I shall be glad to accept it. The Maltby Building has been a bone of contention here for the last 8 or 10 years. A great deal of time has been consumed in discussion relative to it. The effect of this amendment will be to put that building in a condition for use either for housing purposes or for office purposes. I think that will to some extent dispose of the matter, and I accept the amendment. I wish to say in this connection——

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will permit me, before he proceeds, I should like to ask him a question. He has stated that he will accept the amendment. There has been an extensive plan adopted by the architects of the Government for a great park. We have bought land around the Capitol to the extent of three or four squares for that purpose. Included in that great plan for beautifying the city is the tearing down of the Maltby Building, adjoining which is the Bliss Building. I understand those two buildings are to be included in that great park. Congress has adopted that scheme for a park for the beautification of the Capitol and the Capitol Grounds, and it would be unfortunate to spend this money, unless the Government abandons this project which it has on hand to make extensive Capitol grounds here. The tearing down of those buildings, I understand, was included in the scheme, and we ought to look into this proposition before we adopt the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. We have done nothing for years.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that nothing has been done on account of the trouble we have had with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. We have bought some land surrounding the Capitol for several squares, and as soon as the war is over, I suppose, and the question of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is settled, this great scheme will be carried out.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator think we ought to do it in war times?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not, but I was thinking, if the Senator will permit me, that it is proposed that we shall spend $75,000 on some property which is bound to be torn down under the action of Congress heretofore taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I think I have the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to make an observation.

Mr. SWANSON. We shall simply spend $75,000 to put this building into a condition for housing purposes or for office purposes during the war. Other buildings are adjacent to the Maltby Building and under this bill they are directed to be used for housing purposes and to be put in a suitable condition.

This bill also provides that all other unoccupied buildings which are owned by the Government shall be utilized during the war. I think the Government would save money if it spent $75,000 during the continuance of the war to put this building in condition either for an office building, which I think it ought to be, or for housing purposes. It is a large building; it is not occupied. The House of Representatives wanted it to be used for housing purposes; but our committee investigated that, and we found that it would cost $120,000 to put it in condition for housing purposes, and that then it would accommodate not over 137 people. Investigation, however, showed that it could, with a very small expenditure of money, be fitted so as to be used for offices for some of the departments that are now occupying apartments.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. NELSON. I call his attention to line 17, on page 4, of the bill, which limits the use of this building to living purposes. I think the language should be "office or living purposes," and that the bill should be amended in that way.

Mr. SWANSON. That is included in the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which I have expressed a willingness to accept.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand—and I want to get it into the RECORD—that this is to continue only during the war.

Mr. SWANSON. It is done for war purposes; the bill ceases to be operative at the conclusion of peace.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I understand, then, this will not interfere with the great park scheme?

Mr. SWANSON. It would not in view of the previous action of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. I merely wanted to have that in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. This $75,000 expenditure will be on all fours with the $10,000,000 which are to be expended for temporary purposes largely in the District of Columbia, so that it will not be any more thrown away than the rest of the money which we are proposing to appropriate.

Mr. SWANSON. I believe that if $75,000 is spent on the Maltby Building—and I do not think it will take that much to arrange it for office purposes—many of the apartment buildings which have been taken by the Army and the Navy and other branches of the service for office purposes can be turned back to their owners and occupied for residences, and the Maltby Building can be used for office purposes. I think that is a wise thing to do. My objection to the original provision in the bill was that it compelled the use of the Maltby Building for housing purposes alone. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado leaves it to the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds to determine whether it shall be used for office purposes or for housing purposes.

Before I take my seat I wish to say a few words in reference to the erection of the building opposite the Treasury and adjacent to the Belasco Theater. Work on that building has commenced. There has been a delay on account of the inability to get steel and other material.

Mr. GALLINGER. I stated that a little while ago.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, as to the Arlington property, a bill was introduced in the other House for the purchase of that property. The bill went to the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee of the House, and I think was reported favorably by that committee. If I am not mistaken, a rule was also reported by the Committee on Rules of the other House providing for the consideration of the bill authorizing the purchase of the property. That bill, however, was not acted upon. The building is in process of construction, and if the building was to be taken by the Government it was necessary to take it at once in order that changes might be made to adapt it to offices and so that it should not be completed as a hotel. That was the only building of a permanent character available in the entire city of Washington that could be used by the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department, on account of the great enlargement of the Internal Revenue Bureau and the addition of other bureaus, is very much in need of additional space. If Senators will go to the Treasury Department they will see that all over the building clerks are out in the corridors. The Bureau of War-Risk Insurance of the Treasury Department is crowded into buildings scattered all over Washington; in fact, the Treasury Department, as I understand, occupies 18 different buildings in Washington for different branches of its work. Two or three billion dollars will be collected by the Internal Revenue Bureau, and that bureau has had to hire buildings all over Washington.

There was no other building that was available except the Arlington Hotel property, and the purchase had to be made quickly. As I understand, the money had been arranged for to complete it as a hotel. The question came up for the Treasury Department to determine whether they would spend half as much money and erect a temporary building, like the buildings being erected in the neighborhood of the State, War, and Navy Building, or to spend about twice as much for a permanent building that would afford accommodations for all time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield directly. I believe it wise, even if it costs twice as much, if there is use for it in the future, to acquire a permanent building rather than to spend 50 per cent and merely get a temporary building that can not be used for permanent purposes.

I have not looked at the details, but I am satisfied that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, in both of whom I have great confidence, obtained a reasonably fair bargain. The House is very exacting in its investigations of these matters, and the fact that the House committee reported the bill providing for the purchase of this property, and that the Committee on Rules reported a special rule for the consideration of the measure—and that procedure was followed because action had to be quickly obtained or not at all, as otherwise it would have been constructed as a hotel—I think demonstrates that the investment was a wise one, if the property could be acquired for a reasonable price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia a question, because I have been considerably bothered about this matter. He knows that I am not a stickler, nor an unfair critic, but I can not understand why the Government of the United States, as the sole sovereign in the District of Columbia, did not exercise its right of eminent domain and condemn this property and have a proper condemnation jury decide what its value was.

Mr. SWANSON. That might have been done, perhaps; I do not know whether the law provides for that or not; I think the law authorizes condemnation for Army and Navy purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, they could have gotten it for about a little less than half what was actually paid.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know what its value is; I have never looked into that matter; I do not know what the facts are; I do not know what was paid; the bill was not introduced in the Senate; but was introduced in the House and was reported by the committee of the House, as I understand, and a special rule reported for its consideration; but I am satisfied that if any Senator desires to know the facts in connection with the matter he can readily obtain them. I understand that the parties got about what it cost them, with interest. As to whether or not too much was paid, I do not know; but I think it was a wise thing to obtain that property either by condemnation or purchase, if it could be obtained for a reasonable price. It is the only available building that could be obtained in Washington.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. NELSON. There was not any building on the Arlington Hotel site; there was only a hole in the ground.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the last statement made by the Senator from Virginia is true, that what the Government is paying is about what it has cost the present owners plus a certain percentage; but that rule of measurement of value in this particular case will not do. The old Arlington Hotel was torn down, and the owners got ready to build a new and greater hotel there. They went down in the ground about two stories, and found a lot of water and wells, and had to sink a lot of piles, and heaven knows what. I do not now think it is right for the Government of the United States to be charged with the misfortunes of the purchasers of the property or the extra cost which has accrued from having bought land subject to inundation.

Mr. SWANSON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The original price of the Arlington property with the old Arlington Hotel upon it—which by the way ought never to have been torn down; it was a good old hostelry, thoroughly all right in every respect—was not half what the Government is paying for the land, together with the building and the preparation thus far that has been given it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I do not know as to the terms nor as to their reasonableness; but I wish to take the position that if there could have been obtained a building of a permanent character which would be needed and useful afterwards, it was a better proposition for the Government than to construct a building of temporary character, such as many of the buildings which have been constructed and which can not be used after the war is over. I repeat that I have not looked into the matter carefully, but I am satisfied, from my knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, that if any Senator desires to investigate the matter, information will be furnished that will be satisfactory. I think, however, with the War-Risk Insurance Bureau and the Internal Revenue Bureau urgently needing additional space, and with the Treasury Department itself occupying 18 buildings, scattered all over Washington, that it was wise to get a permanent building, if it could be obtained at a reasonable price; and I am satisfied that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury got a very reasonable bargain. As I understand, contracts have been made for the steel, a part of which has been put in place, and that the building can be completed in about six months. I am satisfied that if any Senator will go down and see the Supervising Architect having charge of the matter he will be able to ascertain the cost, what is included in the purchase, and all the facts relating to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry at that point?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know whether or not any other Senator has asked the question, but does the Senator know of this total of $4,200,000, if that be the sum the Government has paid, how much is for the land and how much is allowed for the building?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should think that would be a very pertinent inquiry.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the item for this property would have possibly been included in one of the appropriation bills, but a point of order was made in the House—it was on a deficiency bill, I believe—and if I mistake not, I can not be accurate about that, it was insisted that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the House should have jurisdiction of the matter. So a bill was introduced in the other House and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of that body, authorizing this building to be acquired. It was reported, as I understand, unanimously, although I can not say with absolute certainty as to that; I am speaking merely from rumor and from information. The bill was pending in the other body for some time; and I understand the Committee on Rules brought in a rule for its consideration on the ground that it was an urgent matter. However, the building was being constructed; it had reached the second story, and it had to be determined whether it could be adapted for an office building or for hotel purposes. In view of that situation, there being no other building available, as I understand, upon representations made to the President, he thought it was a wise business proposition for the Government to make that purchase.

As to the price paid, I have never looked into that, and I do not know what it was. The matter never came before my committee. My committee was waiting to act after the House committee acted, but I am frank to say that if the price were a reasonable one and not extortionate, as chairman of the committee, I would have favored the purchase.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SWANSON. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. NELSON. Had the company which sold this property to the Government begun the construction of this building before they sold it?

Mr. SWANSON. They had begun the construction; and the iron frame work, if I can recall, had reached the second story.

Mr. NELSON. They had put up a steel frame.

Mr. SWANSON. The steel frame had been put up to the second story, and I understand that the steel, the cement, and everything else necessary for the completion of the building had been contracted for.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think the Senator is in error in saying that they had in contemplation to erect a hotel. I think it was intended to be an office building.

Mr. SWANSON. My impression was otherwise.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I am right about that.

Mr. SWANSON. I can not say with absolute certainty whether it was designed for an office building or not; but the time had arrived when, if the Government was going to acquire it and could acquire it at a reasonable price, it ought to be acquired so that it might be constructed to suit the needs and purposes of the Government. It was a question of whether the Government should erect temporary buildings for the War-Risk Insurance and other bureaus or spend money to acquire a permanent building; and, if the Government got a bargain and did not pay an extortionate price for the property, I will say I think the purchase was wise. I repeat, that I have never investigated this matter; I do not know what the property cost, and I do not know whether it is a reasonable price; I can not speak as to that, because no information has been brought to me concerning it, and I was waiting until the bill should pass the House and come to the Senate before going into the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to what the Senator has just said, I desire to say that the company which owned the Arlington Hotel had begun the construction of this building; and I wish to say that any Senator who will go down there and look at the building will see that it is not the class of building that the Government of the United States would erect. It is a very cheaply constructed affair, so cheap that the Government architect has in a number of cases substituted stronger and larger steel construction than the original plans called for; in fact, it seems to me, unless that had been done, the building would have been absolutely dangerous. Changes have been made in just as few instances as possible in order to insure safety in the construction of the building.

Mr. President, I think that the building was started as a cheap office building, with the idea of renting it at $2 a square foot during the war; and it was thought by the owners that by a rental of $2 a square foot they would be able to pay at least half of the cost of the building if the war only continued a year and a half longer.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to say, in this connection, that the Secretary of the Treasury—and I have a great deal of confidence in his business capacity and his ability to look out for the interests of the Government—recommended the purchase of this property. I think the best building that has been constructed in Washington, considering cost, floor space, and appearance, is the new Interior Department building. It is a building that looks well, considering the amount of money spent upon it, and in the essentials of floor space and light, I think it is one of the best buildings in Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody denies that.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think it would look still better if it were on Government ground nearer to headquarters?

Mr. SWANSON. Congress located it there. It was located before I was chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but it was located on that site and there was no discretion given as to its location. Congress located it on ground, as I understand, that had been acquired for the purpose of erecting an archives building.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is correct.

Mr. SWANSON. The ground ought to have been utilized for that purpose, but there was no discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand, to locate it anywhere else. I repeat that I am satisfied, considering light, floor space, and cost of construction, that it is the best office building we have in Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that when Congress purchased that property for an archives building, so called, it was a very wise purchase and the location was a very proper one; but it is a very improper one for a department of the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. I remember that I looked into that matter and I thought the building ought to be located somewhere else, in view of its fine character; but Congress located it there and no discretion was left in anyone else. Congress, as we all know, is loath to lodge discretion in others; but if discretion had been lodged in some officer of the Government, the building would have been located somewhere else, where it could have been seen to better advantage and would have been handsomer.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has referred to the land adjacent to the Treasury owned by the Government on which no buildings have been erected, although the land was acquired some years ago. Ever since I have been chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I have spent a great deal of time and gone to a good deal of trouble and worry to get estimates in detail of the space occupied by every one of the departments of the Government. I arranged for such reports to be made, and I tried to secure the passage of a bill providing for the erection of a building on the very ground referred to by the Senator from Minnesota on the corner opposite the Willard Hotel. My committee reported the bill unanimously to erect on that property a building for the Department of State and the Department of Justice, which are to-day renting buildings. More than half a dozen times I brought that bill up and tried to secure its passage in the Senate, but it was never passed, the rules of the Senate permitting Senators to talk measures to death and there being no previous question to enable the Senate to come to a vote. I persisted in that matter until the war came on, when I knew it would be impossible to secure authorization for the construction of a building on that property. But for the Senate long before the war that land would have been occupied by a building for the State Department and a building for the Department of Justice. The land was bought and paid for, and the Government paid $40,000 for plans for the building, which were approved by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, as I have said, reported the bill unanimously, but every time it came up it was either defeated or talked to death; it was not allowed to pass the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think we ought to refresh our memories about that. I do not remember that that bill ever was antagonized in any such way as that. I was very warmly in favor of it, and I think I would remember if any such opposition as the Senator indicates were shown toward that bill.

Mr. SWANSON. When I sought to bring the bill up Senator Root, of New York, or Senator Burton, of Ohio, repeatedly objected to its consideration, or would talk on it, and consequently it was never passed. I have asked repeatedly for its consideration, but other measures have been taken up. I want to say now that the time is coming when an effort is going to be made to put up public buildings here in Washington to house all the activities of the Government, so that the Government will not longer be a renter of property. The Senator will have an opportunity to vote on propositions of that kind and character as soon as the opportunity affords.

The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and myself asked for a joint committee, consisting of representatives of the Appropriations Committee and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to make a report showing the land owned by the Government and indicating the buildings needed for the various departments and their cost. Reports have been made and we have the figures, but on account of the war it was not thought wise to engage in the work at this time; and I hope the Senator, when bills are introduced to take care of the situation in Washington in the future, will aid me in getting them through.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wanted to add, in reference to utilizing the property that we purchased for the very buildings that the Senator suggests his committee reported in favor of, I fear the Senator was not as insistent and vigorous then as he is now, because the Senator of late, when he has a bill to be considered, is certainly as determined and as earnest in its advocacy as any Senator in this body. I do not recall, however, that there was any great contest over that matter. I was so warmly in favor of it myself that I think I would remember if we had been thwarted in our purpose of getting that ground occupied.

Mr. SWANSON. The RECORD will show that repeatedly I brought it up for consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be so.

Mr. SWANSON. It died, of course, with the end of the session. I fully agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the time has come when we ought to have our own buildings in Washington. We ought not to be renters. I favor that. I have had commissions and my committee investigate it; but when the time comes, as a separate proposition, unless it is united with a general bill applying all over the country, putting up buildings at every little post office and crossroads in the country, it is nearly impossible to get it through.

Mr. GALLINGER. That day has passed, we all hope.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope so, Mr. President.

I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one word, Mr. President.

An hour or so ago there was a debate in reference to the so-called Maltby Building. I made a statement then from recollection, not being absolutely sure that my recollection was accurate, that the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, to whom the repairs of the Maltby Building are now to be turned over, had made a report some years ago that that building was insecure and that it was not fit for tenancy. I felt sure that I was not mistaken, but the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] said that I was mistaken about that; that it was the fire department that made the adverse report.

I have taken occasion to look up the matter, and I find that on March 9, 1904, 14 years ago, the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds made a report to Congress in which he came to the conclusion that the building was unsafe for occupancy at that time and that it would take approximately $75,000 to put it in safe condition. In his report he calls attention to the fact that it is not adequately protected against fire, and he calls upon the chief of the fire department for his view about that, and the chief of the fire department supplements the report of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds to the effect that it is absolutely unsafe because of its not being a fireproof building, and a statement is made showing the amount of money that it will take to make the building safe for occupancy, and it amounts to $74,810. So that if the building is to be made safe, according to the views of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds and the chief of the fire department, Mr. Belt, since deceased, it would take the amount of money that the Senator from Colorado proposes to appropriate in this bill, and, of course, it would take a much larger amount to put it in shape for office purposes.

I want that building utilized, however. I want it occupied by the Government, and I certainly shall vote with pleasure for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado, but I shall do so fully satisfied that after that appropriation is exhausted, provided the condition is as it was found to be 14 years ago—and I imagine it has not improved with age—we will have to make another appropriation to put it in shape for office occupancy.

Mr. President, as I am anxious to have this bill disposed of, I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the report either of Elliott Woods, Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds, or of Mr. Belt, who was then at the head of the fire department of the District, but I will ask unanimous consent to insert this report in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 201, 58th Cong., 2d sess.]

SAFETY OF THE MALTBY BUILDING.

Letter from the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution of March 2, 1904, a report on the condition, as to its safety for occupancy, of the Maltby Building. March 12, 1904, laid on the table and ordered to be printed, with accompanying illustrations.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT
UNITED STATES CAPITOL BUILDING AND GROUNDS,
Washington, D. C., March 9, 1904.

SIR: In accordance with Senate resolution passed March 2, 1904, directing the Superintendent of the Capitol to make a thorough examination of the Maltby Building (Senate annex), with the view of determining whether or not the structure is entirely safe for occupancy, etc., I have the honor to make the following report:

The Maltby House stands on what is commonly called made ground. From best information it was years back a dumping ground for all kinds of refuse. The site was formerly occupied by the car stables of the old Washington and Georgetown Railway Co., and the level at that time was many feet below the present level of New Jersey Avenue.

The exterior walls of the building appear to be in first-rate condition, and so far as I have observed have not settled to any great extent.

The original construction contained a brick elevator shaft, which, in the course of time and for the want of a good foundation, settled about 7 inches, carrying with it adjacent walls and floors.

Three years ago this elevator shaft became so insecure that in compliance with a request of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and in conformity with the law approved March 3, 1901, this office shored up the floors and adjacent partition walls and reconstructed the elevator shaft and foundations, substituting a shaft of steel, on account of its lighter weight, for the one formerly built of brick.

The tearing out of this elevator shaft required exceeding care, and when its foundations were exposed they were found to rest on what was practically an old bed of manure, over two cartloads of which were taken out, a new foundation substituted, and walls adjacent thereto underpinned and strengthened. Since this reconstruction I find that there has been little or no settlement at this point.

At the time of the reconstruction of the elevator shaft the floor of the vestibule was forced upward some 7½ inches to bring it approximately to a level.

Throughout the building are stacks of brick running from the ground up to and through the roof, containing fireplace flues. In nearly every case these have settled since the time of the construction of the building. Floors, partitions, and doorways, which by the nature of the construction are in a measure tied to the stacks, have correspondingly settled and are now very much out of level.

Pretty thorough examination into these conditions was made at the time of the reconstruction of the elevator shaft, and one point, the interior wall of the north side, where crossed by the main corridor, has been watched. It appears from comparison made with former observations that a little settlement of this wall and the chimney piers continues, but not to any great extent; at least not sufficiently to create immediate alarm.

The evident danger on account of fire led me to request the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for a special report to be made by the chief of the fire department and fire marshal, a copy of which is hereto appended. Their conclusions are no stronger than the facts warrant.

Wherever settlement of foundation walls has occurred the effects can be seen in the condition of every floor from the cellar to the roof.

To obviate this condition requires the removal of cellar floors to get at and strengthen the interior foundations; the tearing out and leveling up of practically all the floors of stories above the cellar, necessitating new plastering and repairs where the walls, ceilings, and doorways would be disturbed; the resetting of door jambs in nearly all cases. In many instances complete new doors and trimmings would have to be supplied.

The cutting out of interior walls to enable the leveling up of the floor joists would tend to weaken the present structure during repairs.

My final observations are that special precautions should be taken to prevent the overloading of floors throughout the building, especially with books in bags. If such overloading is prevented, there does not appear to be immediate danger.

If the Government desires to continue the use of the building, as they probably will for three or four years at least, I recommend that the entire cellar floor, which is of wood, be taken out and when out that the foundations of the inner walls be carefully examined and, where necessary, reenforced or underpinned, to prevent, if possible, farther settlement. The floors should then be replaced with concrete to keep out the dampness.

If the Senate desires to make the Maltby House a permanent annex, the building should be entirely reconstructed within the outer walls, and that construction should be of the fireproof type, both as to floors and partitions.

If, for temporary occupancy, a new floor in the basement and strengthening of the foundations of interior walls is desired, the expenditure would amount to $8,860.

If it is desired to enter into thorough reconstruction of the interior from cellar to roof, it would require approximately $75,000.

I beg to transmit herewith plans—one of the basement story and one of the first story, which is typical of the floors above it, showing the brick walls and wooden partitions. On these plans will be found arrows pointing the direction of the general settlements which have occurred.

In making the inspection no floors were cut into to determine the condition of the wooden floor joists. Such as were exposed during the late reconstruction were found to be in good condition. To make such an inspection at this time would be an annoyance to those occupying the building.

In making my inspection I was assisted by Mr. S. S. Hunt, a builder of many years' experience, and by the engineer in charge of the building, Mr. Mankin. The latter was in charge of the building at the time the elevator shaft was reconstructed. Since that time he has kept faithful watch for further settlements, and pointed out to me in detail every observation he has made.

Very respectfully,

ELLIOTT WOODS,
Superintendent United States Capitol Building and Grounds.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT
UNITED STATES CAPITOL BUILDING AND GROUNDS,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1904.

The honorable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

GENTLEMEN: I am directed by the Senate of the United States to make a report on the structural and other conditions existing at the Maltby House, now used as a Senate Annex.

I think it is highly important that an examination and report be made by the fire department on the question of the liability to and danger of destruction by fire of this building.

I therefore have the honor to request that the chief of the fire department and the fire marshal be detailed as a board to make an inspection of the Maltby Building and report on this subject.

As my report is desired at the earliest possible moment, I will thank the commissioners if this matter will be given their immediate attention.

Very respectfully,

ELLIOTT WOODS,
Superintendent United States Capitol Building and Grounds.

The honorable COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE FIRE DEPARTMENT
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 7, 1904.

GENTLEMEN: Pursuant to your direction, and at the request of Mr. Elliott Woods, Superintendent of United States Capitol Building and Grounds, to make an inspection of and report on the Maltby House, located at the northwest corner of New Jersey Avenue and B Streets NW., in accordance with a resolution of the United States Senate, I have the honor to report that Fire Marshal Sidney Bieber and I this day visited and inspected the said building and beg to submit herewith the following facts in connection thereto:

The building is of brick construction, five stories in height, with a basement and attic, the attic being formed by a mansard roof. There is a vast amount of wooden material to be found throughout the building; in fact, the roof, that is entirely of frame, is of open construction and would prove very hazardous should a fire occur in this building. The majority of the partitions dividing the rooms from one another are lathed and plastered, and the floors, as well as the stairway adjoining the elevator shaft, are of wooden construction.

There are no modern improvements against fire in this building; that is, no material was found that is termed "fire resisting."

Should a fire occur in the basement of this building the probability is that, unless the department was notified very soon thereafter, it would gain such headway as to do considerable damage before it could be extinguished, if extinguished at all until the entire building was consumed. Even after the department arrived on the scene the greatest precaution would have to be observed by it, for it would be very dangerous for firemen to enter, it being noticed during the inspection this day that the interior walls have settled to such an extent as to render them dangerous in case of fire.

We consider this building extremely hazardous in regard to the liability of fire therein, and we are of the opinion that, on account of the conditions mentioned, it is dangerous for the purpose for which it is used.

Very respectfully,

WM. T. BELT,
Chief Engineer.
SIDNEY BIEBER,
Fire Marshal.

The honorable COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

SOLDIERS' VOTE.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, out of order I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter received by me from The Adjutant General of the Army concerning an order which has been issued by the War Department with reference to the soldiers' vote in primary elections and at the regular November elections. The order issued by the department is so widely at variance and in conflict with the laws of some of the States that it amounts to a prohibition of soldiers from voting or participating in those elections. Of course, I understand that the Army has a right to prohibit the soldier from exercising the rights of freemen if it interferes with discipline or with the regulations; but as to how the soldier shall cast his vote is a matter which is determined by the laws of the respective States, and if the War Department insists upon this order it means a nullification of the laws of some States.

I ask that this letter be read, or, in order not to take the time of the Senate, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have it read.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let it be read, Mr. President. I think Senators would like to hear it, and the country would like to be informed of the order that has been issued, to the end that matters may be put in shape in the different States so as to conform to the regulations of the War Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 22, 1918.

Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: In response to your request for information relative to the arrangements which have been made for taking the votes of soldiers at the various State elections I have the honor to inform you as follows:

It has been decided by the department that, so far as the soldiers stationed within the borders of the United States are concerned, their votes at either a primary or a general election may be taken by the several State governments without serious interference with military operations or with the training and discipline of the men. Pursuant to this decision the following order was issued to all commanding officers in the United States:

"Upon application by the secretary of state or other proper officer of a State government to the commanding officer of a department or division for permission to take and secure the vote of the officers and soldiers of said State serving in said command and within the borders of the United States for either a primary or general election of said State such commanding officer shall specify a place or places where all such officers and soldiers in such command may exercise their State franchise and shall allow the properly qualified election officers of such State the opportunity to secure the votes of its citizens in such command at the place or places so designated and at or during such specified period or periods of time, and conforming as near as may be to the request of said State officer in this respect as shall not interfere with military efficiency. The place or places so designated shall be in such proximity to each and all sections of the troops as will permit them, under the regulations prescribed, to make deposit of their several ballots. Such election officers shall be permitted, if they desire, to erect at said place or places such inclosure or inclosures as may be necessary for the conduct of such election, and at said place or places, but not elsewhere, to disseminate information and literature for the instruction of the voter as to the method to be pursued by him in the marking and casting of his ballot; but this latter privilege shall not be construed to permit the dissemination of information or literature calculated to influence the voter in the exercise of his franchise."

As to the soldiers in France or on other foreign soil in the theater of war, the department has reached the decision that their vote can not be taken without serious interference with military efficiency.

Very respectfully,

H. P. MCCAIN.
The Adjutant General.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is an important matter. Already inquiries are coming to me concerning it, and I will ask the Senator from Mississippi if it might not be well to have that letter printed as a public document?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I shall be glad, if the Senator desires to distribute copies of it, to have that done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. President, I am going to move that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have requested the press to copy it and send it broadcast throughout the country, and I dare say that will be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] sotto voce, suggests that he thinks the letter is in conflict with the laws of many of the States, and that we ought not to send it out. If that is so, I think probably I will not make the motion that I thought of making. If it is to stand, however, we ought to have the privilege of sending it to our constituents without writing long letters on the subject.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the objection of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it is in direct conflict with the laws of a great many of the States; and if we make it a public document and send it out, then those who are interested in the subject, even though it be in conflict with the laws of the States, will feel that the Government has adopted it, and that that would be the practice of our Government.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But the advantage would be that the representatives of the different States will communicate with the Secretary of War, and the order will possibly be modified. Down in Mississippi, for instance, the manner of taking the vote is by a written ballot. The ballot is sent to the soldier, and the soldier votes and signs his name to it. I do not think there is any purpose on the part of the War Department to prevent the orderly execution of the laws of the States; and if that letter were distributed over the country, the probabilities are that the matter would be taken up by the people of the different States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not think that I have reference to any ulterior motive on the part of the Government in having this order issued.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. But I do know that it conflicts with the laws of many of the States. I think if it were made a public document and sent broadcast all over the United States perhaps many of the people of the States would take it for granted that that was going to be the law and that every soldier from those States would only have to comply with the order of the War Department.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator understands that if the vote is not taken in accordance with the State law the vote will not be counted.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I know.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The purpose of disseminating that information is for the purpose of seeing that the soldier shall be given an opportunity to vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. The Senator from Mississippi has exactly the same idea that I have. I do not want the voters of the States to get the idea that this order supersedes the law of the States, and that they may rely upon it, for if that were done when the time came for counting the votes of the soldiers from those States they would fail, and I do not want that to happen.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Would the Senator object to having the letter printed as a public document?

Mr. SMOOT. No; if the Senator, after that explanation, feels that it ought to be printed as a public document, well and good; but I do believe it ought to be called to the attention of the governor of every State by the War Department issuing this order, and then let the governor of each State call the attention of the War Department to the fact that it conflicts with the laws of those States.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if this matter is going to precipitate any further debate, as I am anxious to finish this bill to-night, I shall have to object to its consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not make the motion, Mr. President.

Mr. VARDAMAN. All right; let it go.

Mr. GALLINGER. Later on, perhaps, we will take it up and discuss it.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs."

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SWANSON, Mr. REED, and Mr. CURTIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on what is known as the espionage bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator simply wants to take up the report in order to make it the unfinished business?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. It is the conference report on the bill known as the espionage bill, House bill 8753.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8753) to amend section 3, title 1, of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] desires to speak on this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Not to-night, I hope.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, somewhat representing the minority of the Senate, I am going to indulge in an observation, and, of course, it will be treated for what it is worth.

We have passed a great number of bills at this session of the Congress. We have been diligent in our work. We have laid aside all our prejudices of a political nature, and have cooperated, the minority with the majority, to facilitate the work of the session. Of course, we can not tell what may be presented to us for consideration in the future, but it seems to me that we are entitled now to hasten the work of the session to the utmost extent of our power. I think we ought to stay here a reasonable number of hours each day, and, if need be, we ought to have some night sessions a little later on, with a view of getting through the work of this session not later than the 10th day of July, so that we may have an opportunity to refresh ourselves at our homes and attend to our affairs in addition to our duties here.

I presume the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who has had charge of these great war measures, can not definitely state what we may expect to have presented to us in the matter of additional legislation along that line, and yet, as I understand, there is at the present time no great measure pending.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, not before the Judiciary Committee, which has had these bills, such as the espionage bill, the sabotage bill, and what is known as the Overman bill. They are all out of the way except the espionage bill, and I hope we will get it through to-morrow. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I agree with him that we ought to hasten this legislation, in order that we may get away possibly by the 1st of July, and I do not see any reason why we should not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, I am quite aware of the fact—in fact, it goes without saying—that no Member of this body can speak for the other House; but we know the facility with which the other House can dispose of legislation when they choose to do so. Most of the great appropriation bills, or a portion of them, are yet to come to the Senate. The naval appropriation bill is here, and I apprehend it will be taken up by the committee promptly, and the other appropriation bills will be coming along. We know with what facility our friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], disposes of these matters. For that reason, and other reasons that I will not stop to state, I simply want to say that I know the minority of the Senate will be glad to cooperate in any reasonable effort to bring this session to a close at a reasonable date.

I trust that it will not be considered intrusive on my part to make the suggestion I have made, because I feel that we are capable of wasting a great deal of time unless we have some purpose in view that perhaps appeals to us as individuals and appeals to the body collectively.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has made the remarks that he has. I know myself of no great measures that are to come before Congress other than the appropriation bills, so far as I am informed. The Post Office appropriation bill is here now, and probably will be taken up as soon as this bill is disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I omitted to mention that.

Mr. OVERMAN. And the legislative bill is in conference. The Navy bill and the Army bill, I suppose, will be over here shortly, and why we can not get away in July I do not know. I should like to go on with this bill and consider it for an hour or so this afternoon. If there is any objection, however, of course I want to accommodate myself to the convenience of the Senate. We have been here for a long time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will suggest that I think it would be better if the Senator would put the Senate on notice that the conference report will be pressed to-morrow morning.

Mr. OVERMAN. With that understanding, that it will be pressed to-morrow morning as the unfinished business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will not amend his program by making it July 1?

Mr. GALLINGER. That would suit me better. I added the 10 days simply as a matter of safety.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, unless there is some legislation that will be reported to the Congress that is not now thought of, I can not see but that Congress can easily get through its work by July 1.

I have been looking over the appropriation bills, and I find that the only appropriation bills yet to be passed by the House are the fortifications bill, the pensions bill, the Army bill, and the public-buildings bill, if there is to be one this year. I do not believe it will take the Senate a day to pass the naval appropriation bill. It will take about 15 minutes to pass the pension appropriation bill. I do not think it will take two hours to pass the fortifications bill. Unquestionably there will be no trouble in passing the appropriation bills between now and July 1; and unless there is really some more legislation that is going to be demanded of Congress that we know nothing of, I can not see why we should not get away from here before the 1st of July.

Another thing in that connection, Mr. President. I think that five hours is plenty for the Members of the Senate to be in this Chamber during any day. That applies particularly, Mr. President, to those Senators who spend their time in the Senate from the time the session begins until the Senate recesses or adjourns; and I think that just as much work can be accomplished, if we will attend to the work, within five hours as if we try to hold long sessions one day and then have nothing particularly to do the next day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will move to take an adjournment instead of a recess.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I always like to oblige my dear, good friend the Senator from New Hampshire; but during the pendency of what is known as the Overman bill I had three or four adjournments, and the morning hour was taken up by speeches. I am going to move to take an adjournment to-day, but I give notice that after the morning hour to-morrow I shall move to take up this conference report.

I now move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., Wednesday, May 1, 1918) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 2, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 1, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in Heaven, whose blessings are new every morning and fresh every evening, canst Thou look down from Thy throne of grace upon this sin-stricken world and be still? Judge Thou, we pray Thee, between the enemies of free men who have precipitated a world-wide war on the lovers of peace and compel them to fight for peace. Encourage us by the words of Holy Writ: The race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong. "A thousand times the vanquished, right, hath risen glorified" because of Thy strong right arm, because of Thy love of right. Be with us, we beseech Thee, with the power of Thy might and make us valiant in this hour of peril and give to us the victory for an everlasting peace, and psalms of praise we will ever give to Thee, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, in eliminating a section of the bill H. R. 11259, it throws out of joint the reference to sections, and I ask unanimous consent that the enrolling clerk be empowered to change the numbers to conform with the facts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the enrolling clerk be empowered to arrange the reference to sections in the bill H. R. 11259 to conform to the facts. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4410. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys of the District of Columbia," approved September 25, 1914.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 10613) to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse of the District of Columbia.

APPROPRIATION FOR EXPENSES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a House joint resolution, which the Clerk will report, and he asks unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 284) making an appropriation for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, etc., That the following sum is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, fiscal year 1918, $40,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REGISTRATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate joint resolution 124 and move that the House further insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. That is the 21-year-old bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take the Senate joint resolution 124 from the Speaker's table, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if the gentleman does not want any further consideration of the bill.

Mr. DENT. That is all—that the House insists on its amendment.

Mr. CANNON. In the opinion of the gentleman no other motion is desirable at this time to be considered by the House.

Mr. DENT. I do not think so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN.

AUTHORITY TO PRESIDENT TO SELL WAR SUPPLIES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask to call up the bill S. 3803, authorizing the President to sell war supplies, and move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3803) authorizing the President during the existing emergency to sell supplies, materials, equipment, or other property, heretofore or hereafter purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States, in connection with, or incidental to, the prosecution of the war.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3803) authorizing the President during the existing emergency to sell supplies, materials, equipment, or other property, heretofore or hereafter purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States, in connection with, or incidental to, the prosecution of the war, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same.

S. H. DENT, JR.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 3803, authorizing the President during the existing emergency to sell supplies, materials, equipment, or other property, heretofore or hereafter purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States, in connection with, or incidental to, the prosecution of the war, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The difference between the two Houses consists in the fact that the Senate bill provided that the proceeds of the sale authorized in the bill should be used by each department or bureau whose products were sold, whereas the House insisted that the proceeds should be covered into the Treasury. The Senate accepted the House amendment.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. F. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11692, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to use some of his time now.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, the beginning of my controversy with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was occasioned by his speech in my absence in Chicago, while I was addressing patriotic meetings, supporting the administration, and the enforcement of the laws of this country, in which he charged me with making pro-German statements and disloyal conduct. Returning, through a mutual friend, I asked him in a letter to correct his statements, as I believed that he had been misinformed, and also to correct the statement he made in regard to the legislation which I had tendered. You will remember that that letter was read in my first reply. You will remember that he declined to make a correction of the RECORD, but insisted on leaving the statements as they were. I do not apologize to the House for taking this time in replying to his last speech, for, as I stated yesterday, if he would correct the RECORD in places where he had misquoted my last speech on Alsace-Lorraine, I would gladly accept any terms whereby this controversy might end. I gave notice that I would continue to resent any insulting insinuations reflecting upon my Americanism, from whatever source it might come, and I propose to keep my promise. Now, that same man on April the 23d has again assumed the position of censor, and insinuates that I am not as good an American as he is, and as he assumes in his speeches to tell the Republicans of Illinois what to do in my case, and has notified me that he will come to Chicago to take care of my case, I claim the privilege not only of replying to his insinuating remarks but to place before the people of my State something of the record of this self-appointed censor in order that my people may know just who he is and what he is. He complains that I made my speech of April the 7th in his absence. I did that, and will do it again under the same circumstances, for with that bravery that is characteristic of cowardice he made his insulting speech in regard to me late in the afternoon of the 6th, when, as shown by the statement of the gentleman who spoke for him, he knew he was going away that night and that it was impossible for me to get the floor until the next day. If he had the least conception of legislative courtesy, this would not have happened. He had a month to reply to my speech. I was ready to reply to him the minute he closed, and as soon as I found I could get the floor the next morning, from the Republican cloakroom I notified his office that I would reply to him, and I did not know that he had left the city until after I had taken the floor. I wish my people to know another evidence of his bravery and honesty.

The speech he made, which was sent broadcast over the United States, insulting me in reflecting on my Americanism, was made three weeks ago, and he waited 21 days before printing it in the RECORD. When he comes to Illinois to tell our people what to do—and I hope it is a promise and not a threat—he will be most heartily welcomed; but as I know something of the wisdom of the Democratic committee in Illinois, he will have to hire a hall on his own account if he comes. [Laughter.]

I wish the people to know also, when he comes to our State to run the politics of Illinois, that this is the same gentleman who in the last Congress was forced by a committee to print what did happen in place of what he said happened. I was not then a Member, but in his colloquy with our colleague, Mr. RAGSDALE, he deliberately shifted the word "applause" so as to help him and to injure Mr. RAGSDALE. He corrected this only when confronted by the statement of the Official Reporter, and was compelled by the committee appointed by this House to let the RECORD be printed showing the alterations he had made overnight. He did this to help himself politically. If there had been money or other things of value involved, it would have been a crime. When he comes to Illinois to bellow about his patriotism and my lack of it, I want the people to know that he is the man who assisted the Kaiser by intimating that his colleagues in that Congress had been influenced by the Bernstorff fund, which was not only false and slanderous to his colleagues and not only encouraged the Kaiser but discouraged the American people, who did not believe that that Congress was for sale. When before the committee for these charges he crawfished, denied the statement as to the gambling house, although two or more reputable reporters testified that he did make the statement.

Mr. HEFLIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MASON. I shall not yield for a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I merely want to state, Mr. Chairman, that I am not going to interrupt——

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order that the gentleman desires to make?

Mr. HEFLIN. The point of order is that the gentleman said——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires to make a point of order, he should state it. The gentleman from Illinois has declined to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am doing my best to tell the Chair what I am going to make the point of order about.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman was making a statement that I had slandered Members of the House, and my point of order is that under the rules you can not charge those things, but I shall not interrupt——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire these words taken down?

Mr. HEFLIN. I just want to ask the Republican side not to bother me when I come to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not state a point of order.

Mr. MASON. Driven into a corner, he finally said he "suspected"—he, the magnificent, self-appointed Pecksniff—suspected 12 or 14 of his colleagues in that Congress. He admitted that he had no evidence against them, and declining to give any evidence except his own foul suspicion he appeared before the investigating committee, within two days of the close of the session, and when threatened with expulsion he said before the committee: "Do you think the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy would permit you to humiliate me?" [Laughter.] Brave boy, who soaks you with a snowball and then runs into the schoolhouse. Brave boy, who challenges you for a scrap, and the first time he gets a punch in the face halloos for the teacher. It was near the close of the session; the committee reported unanimously that his conduct deserved censure. He expected a vote on expulsion, and long after Congress had adjourned, and the Members gone home, he exercised his privilege by printing in the RECORD pages of newspaper articles which he adopted as a part of his remarks, one of which referred to the remarkable scandal which he had theretofore stated he knew nothing about. But seeking to gather a little cheap politics for himself and to scandalize his colleagues, he rehashed the whole thing, as if his charges against his colleagues were true and that he had reasons for suspicions, and that he would name the 14 suspects, which up to this time he has never had the clear grit to do.

As to the Age-Herald and his suggestion that I was in some sort of conspiracy with that paper and with the Senator who is running to succeed himself from Alabama, in answer to that I will simply say that the editorial was handed to me by my Republican colleague. I did not know of the second editorial. He says he wrote, "HEFLIN holds House rapt," but paid for sending it. "O Modesty, thy first name is Thomas." My charge that he is playing cheap politics is supported by the fact that he does not deny that he wrote the startling headline of his speech, "HEFLIN holds the House rapt." When you stop to consider that "rapt" means "transport, ecstacy" it will hardly be necessary to raise the veracity of that report, nor is it really necessary to discuss the question of whether he was moved to write these glaring headlines of his own eloquence by patriotism or paresis. [Laughter.]

I did not know at the time I made that speech that he was possessed of enough gall to announce himself for United States Senator for the State of Alabama. So I could not have been in any conspiracy to injure him in his politics, while he stated that he had never had any opposition, and the statement that he is playing cheap politics is borne out by the fact that his speech assailing me, a Republican, in order to build himself up among the Democrats, was so that he could say to his constituents, "I have not only done my best to kill a negro in Washington, but, like the knights of old, I have walked down the Halls of Congress and flung my shining lance full and free at an old fellow, who is a Yankee Republican." He will say to them that he has got all his colleagues scared, and even has defied the Democratic leader, and given notice that the Speaker was not fair. He will say, "I have got everybody locoed and scared to death in Congress, except one Illinois Republican, and I am going after him." When he is abusing me to make votes for himself, will not some one of your fair men down in Alabama tell him that when I was a boy, standing guard at night and nursing the wounded in the daytime, I had all the prejudices of our side that you had on your side, but after I had lived in the big, broad city of Chicago and traveled in politics a few years and came to this House 32 years ago and served with great Democrats like Sam Randall, Carlisle, Crisp of Georgia, and of scores of others that I can not name, I had a broader vision of what my country meant.

Once in Paris, in a theater, I was lonesome, could not understand the language; but when the band struck up the tune of "Dixie" my hands burned in starting the applause.

I knew that I had gotten over my sectionalism and that "Dixie" was as much my land as yours. [Applause.] And I want to say to you that when he seeks to prejudice you against me on account of that you may remember that when an effort was made to erect a monument to the Confederate dead in Chicago, the first northern city that ever did that, I defended it here and received the abuse of small men, as I am receiving it to-day, because I thought that was a patriotic thing to do. I contributed in my small way, and Chicago unveiled the first monument, and the Grand Army of the Republic stood back of me and with me—the men who fought the men in gray. I just simply want you to know that while I am a Republican, and I have defended the economic principles of that party all of my life and expect to do it until I die, yet I never have appealed for the past 25 years at least to sectionalism to support either myself or the principles of my party. [Applause.] I did say that he was doing cheap politics, but at that time I did not realize how cheap it was—I did not realize how cheap it was until from his district and from his State they sent me his announcement as a candidate for the Senatorship, and the cheapness consists in the fact that it is an unfrankable communication, in my opinion, and he is sending it out at Government expense! That is what I call real cheap politics. [Laughter.] I am not going to read it all, and I shall not put it into the RECORD, for then he would be justified in mailing it by the tons. On March 9 he says:

DEAR SIR: I am being urged by my people in every section of the State to become a candidate for the Senate.

[Laughter.]

I hope gentlemen will not laugh. It is one of those serious things—to Alabama. [Laughter.]

And all I wish to say about that is, Mr. Chairman, that I did not know that when I charged him with cheap politics. I say now that there is not a thing in that letter that makes it frankable, and there is no other gentleman upon the floor of this House who sends out political announcements, and sends them out at the expense of his Government, by simply inserting at the bottom an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from Senator SIMMONS, who comments, not unfairly, but who comments upon the amendment known as the Bankhead amendment. Now, I suggest to you gentlemen, any of you who want to avoid payment of your just taxes to the Government we love, and we all love our Government, if you want to avoid paying your political postage, I suggest a letter like this:

DEAR BOB: I am going to run for reelection, and I want you to see Dick and tell him to look after the fourth ward, and tell Harry to look after the floating vote, and get Bill to keep after the lawsuit and get it settled. Mary and the children are all well. Love to all the boys.

Yours,

JIM.

P. S. The following is from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 16, 1918: "HEFLIN holds House rapt."

[Applause.]

He said here the other day, and I have no doubt it is true, that he is willing to die for his country; but, brother, do not die, but live long enough to fix up this little postage account with your Uncle Sam. One of my colleagues suggested that for his campaign he have some pictures painted of himself, holding in his right hand the American flag and his left hand in Uncle Sam's pocket looking for postage stamps. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I remember the day, on the 5th of April, 1917, when the Democratic leader of the House, Mr. KITCHIN, had been pointed out to me, and when this great censor said that he "regretted" to say some things, and then, after lecturing the leader, said that he ought to resign as a Member of the House, and he looked so pretty, and sounded so patriotic, and spoke with such authority I inquired of one of my colleagues who he was, and whether he was the leader over there; and he smiled and said, "That is HEFLIN; he thinks he is the Government." But he says he is only dealing with me on account of my speeches here, and yet he closes his dodging and insulting arguments "that I am a walking advertisement for nuxated iron." He puts it in the RECORD, thereby making it a free advertisement hereafter. [Laughter.] His was a high and lofty purpose. I want to state to you that I wrote the letter that was used as an advertisement. I am not apologizing or explaining or justifying the question of taste, but I wrote it; but to use the language of Sir Walter Raleigh, "I did not dream that so frail a note would attract attention of the 'gun toter' from Alabama."

I quit lying a good many years ago, not only on account of its immorality but it is such a strain on the memory. [Laughter and applause.] I heard Willie Collier a few nights ago in "Tell the Truth." I am determined to stick to it. I wrote the letter, I told the truth about that particular remedy. I wish I could find words in parliamentary language to tell the truth about one particular Member of this body—I mention no names.

But our brave and distinguished friend says in a trembling voice that he tendered his services to the President the day after war was declared. I can see him walking up Pennsylvania Avenue, walking in the center of the street to maintain the equilibrium of the street and in the interest of the passers-by on the sidewalk, and knocking at the White House door, and the conversation was probably something like this:

"The PRESIDENT. What can I do for you?"

This is an imaginary conversation, and see if it is borne out by the record—

"I want to be a soldier and with the soldiers stand,
A safety pin upon my shoulder and a six-gun in my hand"—

For you know he is given to poetry at times, at least he thinks it is poetry. And the President says:

"Why, how did you dodge the recruiting officers down here? There are three or four between here and your place. I suppose you come of fighting stock?" "Yes, sir." "Your forefathers were in the Confederate Army?" "No, sir; they were not." "I understand you made a fine record in the Spanish War?" "Oh, no, Mr. President; there was no draft in that war." [Laughter on the Republican side.] "If I had volunteered there would have been nobody here to protect you against this wicked Congress." "Well, brother, they tell me there are three or four Republicans who are going to enlist in Congress and I suppose they can tell you how to get in. Were you down on the Mexican border in that scrap?" "Oh, no; I was busy." "You were busy?" "Yes." "You were for it?" "Yes; I am for every scrap I can keep out of." Now, I want you gentlemen to know I did not bring this into the RECORD, I did not bring into the RECORD the question of his fortune or misfortune in having shot somebody in Washington. I did not bring it in here. He brought it in; but I say the President might have said to him very naturally, "Are you the man who shot at a black man and hit a white man?" And he would say, "Yes." That is what he told us here the other day, and the President would naturally say, "I do not think you will do, brother. If I sent you out with a long-range gun and directed you to blow up Berlin you would hit Tokyo." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman says, striking an attitude here, "I have no newspaper in Alabama, but I have the ear of the people of Alabama." If Alabama has a friend here, please telegraph that grand old Commonwealth—that has given us men like Morgan, Pettis, Fighting Joe Wheeler—please telegraph Alabama that HEFLIN has their ear, and they had better get it back or it may go where Uncle Sam's postage has gone.

Mr. Chairman, when I mention cheap politics I consider that rather cheap. Mr. Chairman, I called his attention to the fact that I had not mentioned that shooting scrape down on Pennsylvania Avenue. I did not mention it, although I knew about it. I have examined the court record, and I find that he was indicted or arrested way back in 1908, held to await the action of the grand jury, and the indictments were carried along some eight years—August, 1916—up to and after the last Democratic national convention those cases were nol-prossed—at least one was. I do not know the facts about this matter, and I am not competent to pass on it, but when he stands here and brings it in for the purpose of making political capital in Alabama, and says that he did it in defense of a white woman who was being insulted by a negro, I have only, Mr. Chairman, to say this: If that is a fact, a jury in the District of Columbia would have acquitted him in 24 hours. It was not necessary to continue the cases for eight years before they were nol-prossed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I want to say this: I did not intend to mention it. He brought it in. I am accommodating him by giving him the benefit of that in his State for politics. I consider it rather small politics. But when he comes to Chicago to tell the people of my State what to do with me, as he threatens to do, the law-abiding citizens there may inquire why he had to "tote" a gun in the dangerous days of 1908, and I will explain to them, so that he will not be embarrassed. Washington in those days was in a dangerous state, as school children were likely to snowball you at any moment. Twice I have been snowballed by the children of the people of Washington. [Laughter.] And you go into many houses and you will pass a great big globe of goldfish, and they are liable to snap your arm off at any time. [Laughter.] And over here in our great office building, when we open our desks, we are liable to meet at any moment the flashing eye and open mouth of a bull cockroach. [Laughter.]

He suggested he was willing to meet me. I do not know in what sort of an encounter, but if it is a matter of physical encounter I will have to decline. I am not a fighting man. When it comes to either pugilism or beauty, I am not in his class. I learned some years after I was 60 years of age my physical limitations, and if the gentleman had some honest friend to inform him as to his intellectual limitations he might be persuaded to let up on his perpetual lecture tour. He speaks truly of his own beauty; that is, he thinks he is a beauty. Some day he may be disillusionized. In the beauty market I could not hope to compete with him. I realize that it is the peacock that is the beautiful bird, but it takes a stork to deliver the goods. [Applause and laughter.]

In regard to the speech I made on Alsace-Lorraine, he has deliberately garbled it and misconstrued it. The President of the United States, within a few days after that speech, delivered his last great message to Congress and abandoned by "omission" the idea that the return of Alsace-Lorraine was an American demand as terms of peace. And when Mr. HEFLIN assails me on that question he assails the President of the United States. More than that, it is an assault upon the intelligence of all who sit in this Chamber. I said repeatedly in that speech that we would not stop a moment in our preparations for war; that we would not abandon our league of honor. I defended the administration against the assault of persons in his own party. I submitted my suggestions "not in criticism, but in a friendly spirit of humility." It was so received by every Member of the House except Mr. HEFLIN, and his speech showed clearly that he has not the brains to comprehend the question discussed, or he has deliberately and willfully misstated my position as a part of his cheap political game.

I quote to you now exactly what I said, to show you how in his speech, that has been sent all over my State in the newspapers, he makes me say exactly what I did not say, as if he had struck out the word "not" and made an affirmative instead of a negative statement. You know the delicacy of the situation. Why discuss it? This is what I said:

> We must not stop or hold up one bit in our preparations in the prosecution of this war and it would be barbarism to refuse to discuss peace. We will not abandon one moment the league of honor in which we, with our coworkers, fight the Imperial Government of Germany.

Now, this is what Mr. HEFLIN says I said, and to make it worse he puts it in quotations as coming from me:

> "The gentleman from Illinois," quoting from his speech, "endeavors to halt your forces. It is barbarous not to stop and discuss peace terms. Let us stop and parley with him."

That is exactly what I did not say. How long am I to be silent? And how long will you stand conduct of this kind from gentlemen who will deliberately change the substance of what you have said and put it in the RECORD, and then, by reason of the fact that some unfriendly newspaper in a State is willing to print it, convey a wrong impression? I will be glad to discuss that question with him at any time, but the hour for discussion of that is past. The President in his statement omitted any such demand as a part of the American policy.

The gentleman from Alabama boasted that by reason of nagging he has compelled me to change the tone of my speech. He thinks I wish to submit to his canary-bird intelligence my thoughts before telling them to my colleagues. I voted against the declaration of war in obedience to my sense of duty, and I am surprised that any man can get into Congress who can not appreciate the point of view and vision of a man who willingly surrenders his judgment in the cause of his country. We go into political conventions, and when defeated we surrender and follow out the wishes of the party. We ought to be big enough when we are in this Congress to express our honest convictions, as I try to do, and when the Congress voted me down and voted in favor, I have stood for the enforcement of the laws, and I have surrendered my private opinion under the dictates of my conscience and in the performance of my duty. [Applause.] And why should I not? My forefathers have fought in every war for this country, and no man of my blood has ever fired on this flag.

And you will pardon me if, before I sit down——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MASON. I say that I dislike to put these things again in the RECORD, and I do it not wholly as a matter of self-defense, but in justice to the people of my State who sent me here. I have voted my conscience. I was against conscription, but when the conscription law was passed, at every place, public or private, I have stood for the enforcement of the law, because it was a law of my country, and yet this gentleman tries to make it appear in his speech that I was trying to hinder the early sending of troops over there, when there is not any justification for any such charge. In every place where I have been called upon—and, I say, I hope you will forgive me for again putting it in the RECORD, but I am doing it for my own people, who do not know the man who made this assault upon me—I gave willingly and I sent the only son left at home. He did not go to the White House; he did not telegraph me to get him a commission. He enlisted as a private soldier, within 10 blocks of where he was born, and with my consent and his family's consent. He is not afraid of bullets. [Applause.] I do not know why his dad should be afraid of bullies. [Applause.] I am not. I would be an unworthy sire of an American soldier if I were. I have my views about the American flag. It should be worn in the heart and not in the mouth, and this great flag of ours, that has made the world anew and will continue to keep it so, should be to all Americans a heart stimulant and not a mouth wash. [Laughter.] It should be my flag as much as his. I am willing to make any sacrifice, and I shall resent, as I have here, in public or private, at a funeral or a feast, the charges of anyone who reflects upon my Americanism or charges me with disloyalty to the country that my fathers fought for and that my son is now fighting for. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I do not intend that this case shall be switched off onto vermifuge and nuxated iron or made into a nuxated-iron cross which has been conferred, according to Collier's Weekly, upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. I have nothing personal in this matter at all, Mr. Chairman.

The gentleman refers here to my statement last fall that there were 13 or 14 men in Congress whose conduct had been suspicious. That was true. I asked permission upon this floor three times to name them. There were some Democrats among them as well as Republicans. I want to say, though, that there are more than 400 men in this body who have never said or done one thing since war was declared that was not in keeping with the highest and best interests of the country; and when I am taken to task by the gentleman from Illinois for criticizing a speech that he made here February 7, I am representing you, patriotic Republicans, and you, patriotic Democrats. Should I permit that speech to go unchallenged when I heard part of it—he extended his remarks in the RECORD as to the other part, and I read it afterwards. I submitted it to others to see if they got the same impression that I did, and they all said it was wrong and ought to be answered. Mr. Chairman, I made up my mind when I came back here, when Congress reconvened in December, to let that old matter drop; to say nothing about the letters that I had received from the districts of these gentlemen; nothing about the comment of papers published in their own States. I decided to close it up, and I told my friends I had, and they said I was right. But I said, "If any one of them starts a new attack, I am going to answer him."

The gentleman from Illinois, in a speech here in February, was the first one to make such an attack. In his speech here to-day he complains among other things that I misquoted him. The quotations that he mentions here purporting to have come from me, with quotation marks around them, were not placed there by me. I was speaking in the usual way of debate, and said the gentleman said, "Hold your forces; let us discuss peace." I did not say that he said that literally, although that was the meaning of his suggestion.

Now, the gentleman speaks of writing me a letter on a former occasion, that if I did not correct certain things he was going to take me to task, and that he had done so. That was before Congress had adjourned, and I decided to let all of those things go. He says now that I have assumed the position of censor. No more than any other patriotic Member of this House. I think it is my duty to criticize the conduct that I believe does not represent my country correctly now and before the bar of posterity, and when I single out a speech that I am going to bring to your attention later that the gentleman makes upon this floor which I believe is extremely detrimental, injurious, and one which misrepresents my country's position in this war I am entitled to have the support of every patriotic Republican on that side. I regretted the other day that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] heckled me and did all in his power to keep me from discussing that speech and telling just what it was that the gentleman from Illinois had said. I regretted also that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] objected to giving me time to discuss that speech which had attacked my country and misrepresented its position in the war with Germany. I regretted to find that there was anyone on that side that would do that. I know that there are a few of them. Gentlemen, I say again in your presence that the great body of you are as loyal and as patriotic as I am or as anybody on this side. [Applause.] And I will say more than that, the Republican Illinois delegation in this House will not indorse that speech. Foss, of Illinois, will not indorse it. MCKINLEY and MCKENZIE and CANNON will not indorse it. I challenge him to write and present to them a statement saying, "We, the undersigned Members of the delegation from Illinois, indorse these sentiments and statements contained in that speech." I challenge him to do that. I challenge him to get the Republican side, as many as one-fifth of your number, to indorse it, and then talk to me about undertaking to play politics!

The gentleman suggests that a portion of my speech was sent to Illinois. I never sent it, although he sent his gas attack upon me in this House during my absence—a product or result of nuxated iron. [Applause.] That was sent, the entire speech, down to Alabama to the Age-Herald; a little Alabama politics, by way of Illinois. [Laughter.] God of our fathers, what are we coming to in Alabama? [Laughter.] The paper said that the Republican membership, supplemented by a few Democrats, instructed the Clerk of the House to send it down and have it printed, prepaid. I find upon investigation that no Democrat had anything to do with it, but if anyone did he belongs to that list of 13 or 14 that I had in mind last fall. [Laughter.] No loyal Democrat had anything to do with it, and no loyal Republican had anything to do with it. I can name them by the score that never had a thing to do with it. Why did they want to put that on the Republican Party? Then, I asked the Clerk of the House, "Did the Republican membership and a few Democrats ask you to send it?" He said, "No; I never heard of such a thing."

So you see none of this thing ever happened. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] said in his speech that cruel Democrats bought that speech that I am criticizing by the thousands. I find upon investigation that no Democrat had a single copy of it printed, and no Republican—no Member but himself—had copies printed, so the RECORD clerk informs me. Now, then, somebody has been careless with the facts of this situation or is just straying off after a little dose of nuxated iron. [Laughter.]

Now, I am not going to take up my time in going into the immaterial things. I must mention one thing here. The gentleman talks about me having a difficulty with a negro man in Washington a few years ago. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is the first man, as I recall, who ever made reference to that occurrence on this floor. I replied to that showing how some people were trying to nag, worry, and annoy me because I am trying to perform my patriotic duty in this body.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to tell gentlemen here briefly what happened in regard to that matter. I introduced a jim-crow car bill in the House. We discussed it one afternoon. Next morning I received 30 or 40 anonymous letters from negroes, I suppose, threatening my life. I talked with several friends about it and they said, "If you have a pistol, you carry it, for they will assault you; they cut a white boy from Maryland down at the Peace Monument the other night, and you had better be on the lookout." When this negro, drunk and cursing, insulted a white woman on a street car in my presence, a working girl in the Post Office Department, I resented it, and in the difficulty had to shoot him finally, and one shot struck a white man in the leg.

I cared for the white man. I had two trained nurses with him for weeks and, in all, five physicians and surgeons; and they saved his life. It cost me $2,000 to defend that white girl from the insults and insolence of the drunken negro, but I do not regret my act on that occasion or a dollar of the money that it cost me. [Applause.]

That is not all. The gentleman says that a Republican handed him the Age-Herald editorial read by him here before. Doubtless, I will tell you about this woman defended by me on the street car. A Republican told her that if she testified for me she would lose her job in the Post Office Department. When the case was about ready to be tried they speeded her off to the Philippine Islands without consulting me. I did not know that she had gone. She wrote me a letter from a foreign port and said that she had been sent over there to work in the Post Office Department in the Philippine Islands and would not be here to testify. She wrote me a very touching letter and said, if I wanted her to, that she would have her deposition taken and sent over here, and she said, "I will never forget your kindness and protection of me." These are the efforts of some Republicans of the gentleman's type to keep justice from being done me in the case I have mentioned. The grand jury by which I was indicted had more than a half dozen negroes upon it. The case was pushed by certain Republican politicians in Washington at that time, who tried to make me suffer. But I knew I was right in protecting the woman as I did. Does the gentleman indorse that?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the issue. Cicero, I believe it was, told his friend, "When you find yourself under a serious charge and the facts are all against you, make them forget the charge and the facts if you can." That is what the gentleman from Illinois is undertaking to do here to-day.

I honor his boy who fights for my country. God bless him as he goes to the firing line. But I will say this for the benefit of the gentleman, that after his boy had enlisted the gentleman introduced a bill here to keep the boy from reaching the firing line.

Mr. MASON. That is not true.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. Did not the gentleman introduce a bill to keep the President from taking the Army out of the country?

Mr. MASON. No.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was your bill?

Mr. MASON. It provided for volunteers to be sent there, and my son was a volunteer. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Only a volunteer. Then the gentleman is not at all responsible for the boy being in the Army; his boy went in in spite of him if a volunteer. He did not have anything to do with it. But his bill was to tie the hands of the Army and keep the President from taking it out of the country unless each soldier said, "I am willing to go."

I was not going to refer to that. That is a thing of the past. But I will tell you what happened concerning the bill. The pro-German Vierick, notoriously against this Government and for Germany, indorsed this Mason bill and somebody sent petitions all over the country saying, "Vote for the Mason bill to repeal the selective draft." That is what the petition said, whether you call it that or not. "Vote for the Mason bill, which repeals the selective draft." But I was willing to let that go by and bring him down to this speech that he made here in February. Let me get to that. Now, gentlemen, give me your attention.

This is what he said:

Those who are willing and anxious to continue to give the lives of every American and every dollar of American money to transfer the territory of one nation to another will not be here to vote—

And so forth.

Is this country in the attitude of doing that—sending boys over there to transfer the territory of one nation to another?

I denounce that statement as one that does not represent my country's position in this war.

Another one:

The people of the United States are patient. There will be no riots that will shake our Government, for they know that in the cool, quiet days of next November they will be permitted to speak upon questions of life and death about which heretofore they have been silent.

Gentlemen of the House, what did he mean by that statement? What did he mean by insinuating that the people of the United States would not riot? Was there any occasion to make that speech here in February of this year, when our boys were fighting over yonder? Is there any other honest interpretation that you can put upon it except that they do not indorse their country's program and that they will repudiate it? What other meaning can be attributed to it? Gentlemen, is that the right kind of a note to be sounding at a time like this?

What is the next statement in that speech? I will read:

The people in the last analysis govern Congress, and if the people do not govern this one they will the next one.

Now, what did he mean by that? This is the Congress that declared war. This is the Congress that passed the selective-draft bill. This is the Congress that refused to pass his bill, and keeps it lying in the pigeonhole where it belongs. And yet he says that if the people do not control this one they will the next one. Now, listen to this next statement from that speech:

For God's sake let us quit conserving the truth and give out a little of that old-fashioned commodity. The truth is that the thing that stands in the way of peace to-day, that peace that would solve all of these questions that confront us, and which have put us in trouble, is what disposition shall be made of Alsace-Lorraine.

Gentlemen, does that statement represent the facts of your position and mine? Does that represent the truth of the American Government's position in this war? Is that what is behind the boys gone out of my district and yours to fight and die on the battle front in France? No; it misrepresents my country's position. It is inexcusable and indefensible and deserves to be repudiated by this House. Does it speak your views? Do you indorse that? I am not talking about whether the gentleman wants to run for election in Illinois, or whether I should run for the Senate. I have never said I would run for the Senate, but if I do run I will expect and desire to receive only the loyal American vote. I do not want any other kind of vote. No Potsdamer has got any comfort out of any position that I have taken here, any vote that I have cast, or any speech that I have made. I am for my country against Germany in this war. [Applause.]

Let me read again from that speech:

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to discuss, and shall not discuss further, the solution of the greatest stumbling block in our way to an honorable peace.

Gentleman, he is still speaking of Alsace-Lorraine. Do you regard this as a matter to be lightly cast aside? Should a speech like that turn up in the RECORD in the years to come and some man read it and say, "Did you ever read that speech made by MASON, of Illinois? Why, he says that our position is that we were over there fighting to transfer territory from one nation to another, and that we fought on when the only question at issue was the disposition of Alsace-Lorraine. Gentlemen, do you want to stand for that in the RECORD? Gentlemen, listen. I read another statement from the speech that I have criticized:

Since the publication of the secret treaties between our allies we have discovered that when we went to war for democracy our good friends, the English, the Russians, and the French, had agreed just how our English cousins and our French brothers were to slice up Germany, and that noble democrat, the Czar of Russia, was to have a slice of Turkey. We have also learned by the publication of the secret treaties that if we were successful in our fight for democracy that the King of Italy, that great commoner, could turn down the Pope and become sovereign over the farmers of a part of Austria.

Gentlemen, what is the tendency or leaning of the thought in that statement? Which side does it lean to? Does it pull and draw us closer and closer to our allies and them to us; does it contribute to unity of purpose and concerted action between us? No; it assails and attacks the position of our allies who are fighting with us for existence and for liberty. That is what it does. The gentleman says that they had such an agreement when we went into fight for democracy, and that we are fighting with men who want to slice up Germany, and the inference is that that is what we are over there fighting for now. Is there any other meaning to it but that? Gentlemen, is there anything personal in this? There is nothing personal about it with me. If I know my own heart, I am fighting for my country and for a correct statement of her position before the world. [Applause.] This does not correctly state it. Now, did he say in that speech what the President had said, that this war was begun by the military masters of Germany? Did he say what the President said, that Germany dragged us into this war, and that we could not remain out without being dishonored and disgraced? [Applause.] No; he does not say that. He nags at the allies. He talks about the only thing that stands between us and peace, when our very existence is at stake. And yet some gentlemen on that side sit and cheer the gentleman, which shows, I presume, that they indorse the stand that he takes in this speech. That will be a question for them to settle before their constituents this fall.

Now, I read further from that speech:

And some of you maybe were surprised when you discovered that our good friend, the Mikado, who does not want to own land in this country or send his children to the schools of California and does not want the Sandwich Islands or the Philippine Islands, and who while in our fight for democracy has not found it convenient to send a man or a ship to help us while we are helping him. I say some of you may have been surprised that our Japanese friends, while expecting our assistance in this fight for democracy, had a secret treaty with the great democrat, the Czar, whereby they were to fight your Uncle Sam in the Far East in case action should arise and we need the whipping.

Why that suggestion at a time like this? Japan is an ally of England, one of our great allies. Why should anything be said to reflect upon Japan?

Is there anything in this about Germany, about the murder of the Archduke and Duchess of Austria as a pretense and excuse to begin the war? Is there anything about the Kaiser saying "On to Paris and world dominion"? No. Anything about the Crown Prince telling Gerard they had 500,000 reservists that could strike this country down before it could raise an Army? No. Anything about the spies right here in Washington and over the country blowing up munition plants, destroying our property, and inciting sedition and treason amongst the people? No. Nagging at the allies, nagging at Japan, England, France, Russia, Italy? My God! What greater contribution could be made to the enemies of the Government than such suggestions as those. Do gentlemen here stand for that? Do you indorse that? Here is another statement from that speech, speaking of the mothers of America:

They know, if they have been through high school that never before in the history of the United States have Americans been conscripted to settle ancient questions pending between other nations.

My God; such a statement! I was in my district week before last and a mother who works in the cotton factory at Lanett came up after my speech in the interest of the liberty loan, shook my hand, and said, "Mr. HEFLIN, I want to thank you for your speech and for what you are doing for our boys. I have got one in France already and I have another who will go if necessary as soon as he is old enough"; and the tears were in her eyes as she spoke, and I thought as I came away, My God; was there ever a more full and complete heart offering than that of a mother presenting her boy at the altar of her country—and then sit silent when a speech is made here saying that American mothers who have been through high school know that never before were boys conscripted to go and fight to settle ancient questions pending between other nations! Is that what we are fighting for? The President of the United States said, "We are fighting for the rights and the liberty of the American people." "American sovereignty is at stake," and that "to withhold our hand was to dishonor the flag." But here is an insinuation that our boys are being conscripted to fight to settle disputes between other nations. My God, gentlemen, were you willing for that speech to go down to posterity unchallenged, unanswered? I am not; and that is the sole purpose of my attacking it before and again here to-day.

The gentleman has read what the papers said about me. I gave him notice the other day that I hated to refer to newspaper comments upon him, but the Chicago Herald, in his own State, says of him that his attitude has affronted the patriotism of the Nation. I am not saying it. The Chicago Post, another Republican paper, says of him that he is a German-helping Congressman. I did not say that, and I asked him before not to make me say these things upon the floor, but I am now like he said of himself—I dare to do my duty here if it cost me my life.

The gentleman says that I do not know a recruiting station when I see it. I may not be able to recognize a recruiting station, but I can not be deceived about a Potsdamer. [Laughter.] The gentleman says that I would not be able to hit a German on the firing line. I may not be able to hit a German on the firing line in France, but I shoot with unerring precision at the bull's-eye of slackerism and sedition in Washington. [Applause.] I can not be deceived by the waving of hands that resemble those of the American Esau, for I recognize the voice of the German Jacob. [Laughter.]

So much for that. Another paper say that Gov. Lowden was called over there to take charge of a meeting where the gentleman was to speak for pacifists. Does that look like he was contributing to our cause? I have got the newspaper article right here. Gov. Lowden came himself to take charge of the situation, the paper says—the governor of Illinois. No governor of my State has ever been called to a meeting where I went to make a speech, except to applaud the patriotism of my speech. No paper in my State or out of it has ever challenged my loyalty or questioned my patriotism. Here is what the Omaha Nebraskan said about the situation here last fall:

Every Kaiser booster in the House took occasion to join in the abuse of HEFLIN, the 100 per cent American from Alabama.

That is what the papers say about me, and I have read what the gentleman's own papers say about him. Here is another one. The Gazette, of York, Pa., says:

Congressman HEFLIN has consistently been a loyal American.

Here is what the Birmingham News says:

All through those months antedating the war, and even after the declaration, there were congressional speeches attacking methods of the administration, speeches with double meanings, delicate turning and twisting of sentences that might easily have been attributed to Germanic influences. Through all that mêlée of strange tongues TOM HEFLIN, of Alabama, was at the forefront of the fighting in defense of clean, outspoken, thoroughgoing Americanism.

[Applause.]

That is what the papers of my State say about me, and I have given you what the Chicago Post and the Chicago Herald, Republican papers, said about the gentleman from Illinois. I have some letters here about the gentleman, but I will not take the time to read them now. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has just about one-half minute.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will ask the gentleman to yield me a little more time.

Mr. SISSON. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HEFLIN. Wisconsin has had a house cleaning. The legislature of that State by resolution has repudiated one who has not measured up to the standard of American loyalty in that State. The people at the polls have repudiated Berger and elected a loyal man, LENROOT, to the Senate from Wisconsin. [Applause.] I hope this fall to see every disloyal Republican on that side beaten and every disloyal Democrat on this side beaten.

I would not go into the district of a Republican who has been loyal here, if that is the issue, and help somebody to beat him, and I will not go into the district of a Democrat who has got a yellow streak in him and ask them to return him at the next election. I will say to the House that if I had my way about it there are two or three or four on either side here that I would not vote for for reelection. I will say that to you frankly. I am not playing any favorites in this matter. There are a few in here on both sides that if I had my way about I would not return them to the House.

But, gentlemen, let me say this in conclusion: I know that the heart of this House is loyal to that flag; I know that the newspaper boys who sit in that gallery, nearly all of them, with the possible exception of a very few, are just as loyal as I am and as you are. I am fighting for the boys at the front; I am fighting for my country if I know my own heart. Let gentlemen criticize me personally—I am ready to take it—but I want to stand squarely by my people and by my country and be able to say that I did what I could to close up the ranks in this House. I want to make my contribution in this time of war to the complete solidarity of the American people. [Applause.] That is my position, and the gentleman's speech that I have here criticized is not in keeping with that position. It misrepresents my country's position; it is inexcusable and indefensible and ought never to have been made in this House. Now, if the gentleman wants to go along hereafter standing by us and with us all down the line, I welcome him to the ranks. I do not want him to assail my country and its position, or anybody on that side, or anybody on this side. If he rises on this side I will criticize him; if he comes up on that side again, so help me God, I will criticize him.

Gentlemen, let us stand together, all together, behind the President of the United States. America no longer held together by outward force and barriers, but bound together by the ties of love and loyalty, and the cling of section to section—one heart, one country, one flag, America—incarnated spirit of liberty and power in the hands of God to prevent democracy and liberty from perishing from the earth. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] 35 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Can I yield a portion of my time and reserve the balance and then use it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to my colleague; but in view of the circumstances I do not think it is necessary, and I will yield back the time to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, ever since the outbreak of the European war, as a part of her system of frightfulness, Germany has sent her agents through the civilized world to spread vicious propaganda, to burn and poison, to destroy and to kill, wherever she could in any way impair either the morale or resources or strength of her adversaries. It is a new method of warfare and worthy of its Prussian inventors. It harmonizes with broken treaties and scraps of paper and poisoned gases, defiled women, ravished and desolated countries, submarines and sinkings without trace. For 40 years, while Germany was perfecting her military machine for "the day," she was sending her spies and secret agents into every country and sequestering them there until she should need them. Before we entered the war Bernstorff and his associates sat in pretended amity with us and secretly sent out their agents and spies, paid with German gold, to burn our factories and destroy our industries and take the lives of our people. It was a comparatively easy process. We were not at war with Germany, and, of course, the secret agents of Germany could and did carry on their work of destruction with impunity.

After our entrance into the war the system of sabotage that had been carried on during our neutrality continued, but to a greater degree. In the hope that I may, perhaps, direct some degree of public attention to the extent of these outrages, and with the hope that further and more drastic action may be taken to curb these secret crimes of sabotage, I desire, in the time allotted to me, to make some general observations on this subject.

At the expenditure of some considerable time and effort I have attempted to estimate the vast extent of sabotage in this country since the declaration of war. Such a task in itself is a difficult one. There is no department of government that has attempted to list or classify these crimes so that we can form an intelligent idea of their extent. I have applied to the chief of the Bureau of Investigations at the Department of Justice and am told that, owing to the many problems connected with the war which that bureau has had to deal with, the bureau has not kept up the ordinary classification of crimes prosecuted by it, to say nothing of a classification of these crimes of enemy aliens and sympathizers.

Therefore, to get an intelligent idea of the magnitude of the work of the spies and disloyal criminals in the country, we are forced to rely largely on the reports as gathered by the Associated Press and other news bureaus and published in the daily press of the country. These reports, of course, are not entirely accurate. In the general excitement throughout the country, caused by the war, people are apt to see in every burning and every calamity the nefarious hand of the enemy. There are doubtless fires and explosions reported as caused by the enemy that arise from natural causes. But it is equally true that there are many cases unreported by the press bureaus that are caused by incendiaries and enemy sympathizers. For instance, during last fall I had occasion to be at Lewes, Del., during one of the short intermissions of Congress, for some days. This is the heart of the tomato-canning district, and at that particular time, in September, the crop was coming in and was being canned at the many canneries through the country. In one week's time three factories in that locality were burned, with hundreds of thousands of cans of this valuable vegetable product, and in some cases many loaded cars were also consumed. These fires were known to be incendiary. In all of them the fires originated in many places at once, and those first on the scene found evident traces of the use of kerosene. So far as I could observe, there were no reports of these outrages in the metropolitan press; only local mention in local papers was made of them. As will be indicated in my statement of crimes hereinafter, it is very evident that very large numbers of injuries to life and property directly traceable to the activities of enemies or enemy sympathizers are unreported by the press, probably sufficient to more than balance those reported as the work of the enemy that are, in fact, from natural causes.

In the examination of the crimes of sabotage I have only taken such as are reported to be supposed to be of an incendiary or intentionally destructive character. I have also confined myself to reports of fires and explosions in plants engaged in war industries or having to do with war contracts of some kind.

Do not understand me as stating that all these crimes which are committed are the work of enemy aliens. Some of them result from the activities of disloyal citizens of our own country. As to all such, I may remark, our statute on treason applies, and I am convinced that a liberal use of its drastic provisions in such cases would be highly efficacious. I am informed by the Department of Justce that almost all of the pro-German propaganda in the country, while it is doubtless inspired from German sources, is in fact spread and circulated by pacifists and agitators and American pro-German sympathizers; such men as the one who recently stood before the people of one of our States as a candidate for the high office of United States Senator on the shameful platform of an abandonment of the war and peace on any terms dictated by the common enemy of mankind.

In the month of April there were reported five great incendiary fires and four explosions in industrial plants making war munitions. One of these, at least, was known to be the explosion of a bomb. One of them was the terrific catastrophe of April 1 at Chester, Pa., of the Eddystone Ammunition Corporation plant. On the 19th, at Trenton, N. J., some prowler about to be foiled at his work, shot at and attempted to kill, from ambush, a soldier sentry. But fragmentary estimates of losses are given, but the losses reported by the press for the month of April in five of these cases were $1,500,000 in money, and in all 124 people were killed and 54 wounded. The money loss does not include the loss at the Eddystone plant.

It will be remembered that the press reports of these crimes do not often give an estimate of the money losses; therefore, the estimates I give here are probably not 50 per cent of the actual losses in money, to say nothing of consequential losses.

In May, 6 incendiary fires were reported and 4 explosions in war plants. But four estimates of financial loss out of the 10 were obtainable, and these aggregated $1,715,000. In this month there were 9 people killed and 25 wounded in these disasters. Two steamships were set on fire at their docks, one the German steamship Princess Irene at New York, and the other the British steamer Matoppo at Boston. Another steamship pier was blown up at Sault Ste. Marie. This month, also, began a series of poisoning outrages, which has continued ever since; a large number of soldiers were poisoned at Pittsburgh, Pa.

In June three incendiary fires were reported, one of these a steamship that burned at its pier. Six plants were wrecked or injured by explosions. Of three reports of losses, the estimated loss was $1,450,000; 19 people were killed and 36 wounded in these occurrences. Among them the water system of a city was destroyed by dynamite. The poisoning continued; anthrax germs were used to inoculate cattle, and large numbers died by reason of it. In addition many attempts were made to inflict injuries that failed. An attempt was made to wreck the train in which Gen. Wood was traveling near Birmingham, Ala. A bomb was found in an aeroplane factory, and other similar outrages were prevented.

In July incendiary fires almost without number were reported. Aside from fires in great industrial plants making war munitions, in the early part of the month, from all over the Northwest, many elevator fires were reported. There are no available estimates of the number of these elevator fires. How many bushels of sorely needed grain were then destroyed it would be hard to say, but it is doubtless a large amount. In one elevator fire at Rochester, N. Y., $1,000,000 worth of grain and property were destroyed. At Klamath Falls, Oreg., 225 horses and cattle were reported poisoned; at Sacramento, Cal., hogs and cattle were poisoned in large numbers; at Mobile, Ala., cattle were poisoned with anthrax germs; at Kansas City, Mo., tetanus germs were used in court-plaster. Two fire losses reported aggregated $1,350,000; 11 were killed and 62 wounded during the month.

In August these crimes fell off noticeably. In that month there were but few losses from sabotage reported. In two of them reported, however, there were financial losses of $1,500,000, and four people lost their lives.

During the month of September the ordinary amount of crime of this nature continued. At Fort Sheridan, Ill., many horses were reported killed by the use of arsenic on the hay. The cargo of the Swedish steamer Magdo was set on fire at her dock in New York, with a loss of $1,000,000. Three fire losses reported were $1,100,000 and four people were injured.

Now, I desire you to observe that these crimes, this violence I am speaking of, is not decreasing but is rapidly increasing. As I have observed, in August but six such occurrences were reported. Observe, now, how they increased in October. Early in the month a series of incendiary fires broke out in the fruit-packing plants and warehouses near San Francisco, Modesto, and San Diego, Cal. How many there were or how much fruit was destroyed it would be hard to say. Elevators were burned with millions of bushels of grain. Still the devilish poisoner plied his trade, and attempts were made at Princeton, N. J., to poison aviation students with cyanide of patassium, and at St. Paul tetanus germs were found in large quantities in vaccine. Eight fire losses estimated a loss of $9,260,000. Piers and docks were burned and ships were fired at their docks. One grain elevator at New York was lost, with 700,000 bushels of grain and a money loss of $1,200,000. So frequent were the fires along the water front in New York that Police Chief Kenlon reported during the month that there had been 56 water-front fires "lately."

I have not time to recount all these matters. I wish I could, that I might impress more vividly the necessity of doing something to fight the enemy in our own country. I have tabulated these outrages as I have gathered them from the press, but unless it is desired I shall not burden the House with reading them at large.

In November alone 10 people at widely separated points were poisoned and killed by tetanus germs in vaccine. Many explosions and fires occurred, and many incendiary and explosive bombs and infernal machines were discovered before they had done their work. To illustrate the lack of care we use as a Nation in this war, on November 11 the plant of the Washburn Wire Co. at New York, N. Y., burned, thought to be incendiary, with a loss of $2,000,000, and with much material needed at once by our military forces. At the time there were working in the plant 25 enemy Germans and 200 enemy Austrians. I say enemies, for it is true, is it not, that a citizen and subject of a nation with whom we are at war owes allegiance and service to his mother country? If he did not, he would be a poor citizen indeed. Only six estimates of losses were given, and these aggregate $2,902,000; 21 people lost their lives, and 85 were wounded and injured. A steamship at its pier in New York was thought to be set on fire. Thousands of cattle were poisoned during the month, and many elevators burned. It was reported that at many widely scattered points in Minnesota and the Dakotas elevator fires occurred.

In December the losses continued undiminished. Ten reported losses were $3,172,500, while 15 people were killed and 50 were wounded. Powdered glass was used in many places. Thousands of surgical dressings were found poisoned and destroyed by medical inspectors. Torpedoes were found ready for use with defective gyroscopes, doubtless so made by intent.

In January and February the losses mounted. There were more fires, more explosions, ships, wharves, steamboats, transfer plants, supplies were burned or destroyed by bombs or explosives. In January, of 14 losses reported, the aggregate was $7,210,000. One man lost his life and 58 or more were injured. In February, in 9 losses reported, $1,910,000 was given as the aggregate, and 3 were killed and 26 injured.

During March three losses reported were $1,910,000, and five were killed and scores injured.

An inspection of these losses demonstrates the general character of them and the objects that were evidently sought to be obtained. They invariably affected some necessary war activity or industry. In the list you will find the objectives usually attacked were ships and shipyards, chemical plants, munition factories, and foodstuffs of all kinds. They were not confined to any particular locality, although most of them were along the Atlantic coast; they occurred in almost every State of the Union, and wherever food or munition supplies could be most easily and vitally affected.

This concludes a year of war. No one knows how much the aggregate financial loss is. As has been stated, estimates are not made in half of the cases. Hence we can not estimate the loss, but the ones I have mentioned aggregate the astonishing total of $32,078,000, while 212 people were killed and 490 maimed and injured. I believe I am exact in saying that more people have been killed during the first year of war by acts of sabotage than there were by the land operations of the enemy.

Now, making allowance for the cases I have enumerated, which are accidental, it is evident that the ones which were the work of enemy spies and sympathizers were detestable crimes of the utmost violence. Can anyone imagine a more heinous crime than the act of the miscreant who places explosives where they may, hours or days afterwards, wreck and ruin everything near them and destroy innocent human life? If this is not murder, what is murder? "Thou shalt not kill" has been the injunction laid upon mankind from its infancy. It is the one crime that all the races have agreed merits the extreme penalty of death. For the soldier who meets his foeman in the strife and kills there is excuse and even commendation, but for the sneaking, cowardly hound who slinks through the dark to his ghoulish mission of destruction and death there is but one fitting end—the rope or a firing squad before a blank wall.

Has anyone heard of the infliction of any severe punishment on anyone who has been guilty of any of these crimes since the war began? As a matter of fact, it is probably true that but few have been arrested for such crimes. Many arrests have been made and many convictions had throughout the country for alleged disloyal statements, but I dare say but few for positive acts of sabotage. The principal reason for this was the lack of a Federal law on the subject; there were ample State laws, but little enforcement of them. Therefore the criminal does not fear the law and the acts continue in full measure. We ought to stop it for two reasons: To retain our self-respect as a nation, surely we ought to be able to suppress the enemy in our own land; and, second, that our resources may not be destroyed and dissipated, while we are straining every energy to do the mighty task allotted to us. These crimes will not end until we instill the fear of God into hearts of all who would commit such outrages. They will not end until we lead some of the criminals out before the people and before the guns of a firing squad make them expiate their crimes.

A failure to punish these criminals will lead to disorders among our people just as sure as the morrow is coming. There have already been outbreaks reported which are typical of what may occur at any time. When the minds of the people are overexcited because of war activities, when they are giving their boys to the battle, when they are giving up their property to pay taxes and their earnings as loans to the Government they will not patiently submit to the work of traitors and spies at home. The people of this country are fast coming to the time when they will begin to hate and they will take a hand in this matter if Congress and the officers of justice of the Government do not do what they can.

If it is true, as we fear it is, that the American people are just at the beginning of years of war; if it is true, as we are coming reluctantly to believe, that many a long and bloody day shall pass before the Hun shall be willing to keep within his own domain and keep the peace with the world; if our best and noblest and bravest sons must die before this bloody business is over, we at least ought not to permit the enemy to attack us from behind while our soldiers are facing his guns at the front. Not all of us can carry the guns and do the fighting; some of us must cross the seas and some must stay; but we who stay can keep our country loyal and true and crush out sedition and treason and the machinations of our enemies at home.

And when one thinks of it seriously there is no particular reason why crimes of sabotage should not occur at frequent intervals and extensively throughout the entire country. The Chief of the Division of Investigations of the Department of Justice informs me that there are approximately 415,000 enemy Germans in the United States and 1,500,000 enemy Austrians. How many Turks and Bulgars there are nobody knows. The Department of Justice does not know; the Bureau of the Census does not know. Where they are no one knows. It may be said that as to these Turks and Bulgars, their number is inconsequential, and we are not at war with them, anyhow. Be that as it may, their people are fighting our friends, and if they win, we lose; if they are victorious, we suffer the fate of the vanquished, do we not? Whatever the facts may be about a declaration of war, these people owe allegiance to their mother countries and will help them if they can. It has been said a great number of Austrians in this country, of Slavic descent, are hostile to the central powers; this is true. I know of Austrian citizens in my district who are giving their boys to the military service and in their hearts despise the government of their mother country.

It has been said that without the labor of the Austro-Hungarian citizens many of our mines and industrial plants would have to close. It is not desirable to take these workers from their places unless it is necessary, but a system of careful registration of and reports by such enemy aliens is highly desirable; the enemy alien who is a friend of this country will be glad to report when required to and thus help the country. If he is not willing to do so, he is not a friend of our cause and ought to be interned or deported.

A careful registration of all alien enemies should be made, including Turks and Bulgars. Whenever an alien enemy goes from one place of residence to another or from one occupation to another, the Government should know where he goes; and he should go only on permission of the proper officers connected with the Department of Justice or some other proper department of the Government. In other words, the Government should know all the time just exactly what every enemy alien is doing and where he is. This is the method pursued in other countries, as I understand it. Imagine, if you please, an alien enemy to Germany roaming around Berlin without surveillance by the authorities. Imagine a German citizen in London doing as he pleases. In Germany in peace time there is absolute knowledge by the authorities of the comings and goings of every stranger. The same is true in other European countries. I would not favor this system in times of peace. I do say, however, the exigencies of the war require a careful surveillance of enemy aliens in a time such as this.

War was declared April 6, 1917, against Germany. The same day the President issued a proclamation enjoining upon male German aliens above the age of 14 years certain obligations. They must not bear arms, nor operate aircraft or wireless apparatus; they should not approach a fort or Government post nearer than one-half mile, nor print attacks against the Government, nor commit hostile acts, nor live in areas prohibited by the proclamation of the President, nor land in or depart from the United States without permission. There was no provision for registration, and there was none for six months following the declaration of war.

However, there was a statute that authorized the President to intern or deport or register these alien enemies at any time after the declaration of war. This act has been the law for 120 years, and was enacted July 6, 1798, being section 4067 of the Revised Statutes.

On the 16th day of November, 1917, the President issued a second proclamation. This proclamation required all alien enemies—German—to register at times and places to be fixed by the Attorney General by regulations to be issued by him. The President directed this registration should be "as speedily as may be practicable," and that registration cards should be issued to all alien enemies, and that the Attorney General might make such rules and regulations as he thought fit. It also provided that no alien enemy could change his place of abode without permission.

I also direct special attention to the fact that the President, by this proclamation, authorized the Attorney General to make such regulations for "monthly, weekly, or other periodical reports" by the aliens as he might think necessary.

That proclamation was issued, as I have said, on November 16, 1917. The Attorney General issued his regulations about six weeks later, on December 31, 1917. The registration began on February 4, 1918, and has just been concluded and the blanks are just now being returned to the Attorney General's office. There are approximately four or five hundred thousand of them. When I last inquired about this matter they had not been filed nor classified nor indexed, but were simply a conglomerate mass of information, tons of it, but with no immediate value, because it was not in shape to be available. In response to my inquiries at the office at that time I was told that it was not known how soon this work could be done.

The President recommended that the alien enemies should be required to report. The Attorney General has not required it. His published regulations required no reports at all, and in that respect he has disregarded a safety provision of the President. Of what value, pray, is the registration of a man if from the day he registers the Government has no method of ascertaining his whereabouts. If an alien enemy living in Baltimore goes to New York and remains there for a year, how is the Government to know of it under the present regulations? But if this alien enemy, once a week, or periodically, must call on the proper authorities and identify himself and report, when he fails to report the Government at once is advised and will attempt to locate him and ascertain his business.

The Department of Justice informs me that they are now considering the advisability of inaugurating a system of reports by enemy aliens of German descent. However, the point is, that after a year of war no such reports are required, and it is uncertain when they shall be.

On December 7, 1917, we declared war on the Austro-Hungarian Government. On December 11, 1917, the President issued his proclamation enjoining upon Austro-Hungarian citizens, resident here, three duties—not to depart from or enter the United States without permission, and making any such alien enemy liable to summary arrest and confinement who violates any laws, rules, or regulations, or who seems to be dangerous. There was no registration of Austro-Hungarians at all provided for.

Therefore, we find after a year of war, in which we have spent many billions, in which our sons have died on the sea and on the land, in which we have lost millions in money and stores of food and munitions, whose value to us now is almost incalculable, by torch and bomb, we have no knowledge, as a people, of whom the enemies are that are among us. We do not know their numbers or where they are. We do not know their comings or their goings. There may be a million of them, or there may be 3,000,000. They may be employed, and doubtless are, in every munition plant and mine and arsenal in the land. And, what is more essential, we do not seem to have any plans for bettering these conditions in the immediate future We seem to propose to muddle along somehow and do things only when we are obliged to by impending disaster. The policy seems to be to disturb no alien enemy until he burns a factory or a ship, and then to intern him in comfortable quarters, with good, wholesome food, instead of shooting him dead at sunrise, as he deserves.

I said in the House on February 12 last that I did not believe criticism in times of war was defensible unless it was constructive. What remarks I have made have not been intended to be in criticism of the administration at all, but are simply made with the hope that they may attract attention to a condition that we all want to see bettered. I have stood by the country in every measure that has been proposed to this Congress. I have supported the President in everything he has asked for. I propose to continue supporting the Government and the President in every measure that may be suggested for the good of the country and which will help us whip the accursed Hun and secure the blessings of peace and honor to us and our posterity.

I believe that every German and Austro-Hungarian alien enemy ought to be at once registered and required to report at frequent intervals at certain designated and convenient registration points. The Department of Justice should be directed, by proper legislation, to maintain surveillance over these alien enemies, and proper appropriations should be made for this purpose by this Congress. It is absolutely futile to expect the Department of Justice to do this work without ample financial provision for so doing. There should, above all things, be a most stringent law as to sabotage, imposing a maximum penalty of death for such offenses. The law just passed, with a maximum penalty of 30 years' imprisonment, in my judgment, is insufficient. Why should we be so tender with those alien enemies who imperil and take the lives of our people by their crimes? Why leave them to be prosecuted in the courts of the States, whose proceedings are notoriously slow and full of delays? There should be ample Federal laws, and the remedies should be certain and the machinery summary.

One other suggestion I have in mind. We have many agencies in our Government for the detection of crime, but no central authority. The Army has its Army Intelligence; the Navy its Naval Intelligence; the Department of Justice has its Division of Investigations; the Post Office Department has its system of inspection and investigation; the Treasury Department has its Secret Service engaged in investigations of revenue and other crimes. The work of these various branches of the Government is secret and extends over the whole country. In many instances the work is liable to be duplicated, while the work of all these various agencies can not be centralized upon any particular object with ease and celerity under the present system. It would seem that it would be better that the secret service of the Government be consolidated under one supreme head and the activities of all be directed by one central authority. It seems to me that more efficiency would result, less expense would be entailed, and more crime would be punished. In this particular instance that I have been discussing—the control of alien enemies—great advantage would doubtless result. I am told that frequent and regular conferences are held between the heads of the various secret-service departments of our Government, and in this way the various branches work harmoniously. We shall find, sooner or later, that these agencies can not function separately if they are to be of the highest efficiency. The allies have found that to be at all successful there must be one supreme command. The Germans always knew it. It is equally as true in our Government and it is true in the secret service. There ought to be one chief directing mind.

Let it be understood that I am not criticizing others and losing sight of the derelictions of Congress. On April 4, 1917, there was introduced in the Senate a bill to punish acts of sabotage. It was not at all a drastic bill. It did not provide the death penalty, as it should have done. That bill, I am told, was prepared by the Department of Justice, and was sorely needed. However, it did not finally pass both Houses of Congress until a few days ago. The slight amendments sought for the espionage law have just finally been agreed to in conference. There have been no attempts at all on the part of Congress, as I am advised, to give such additional powers to the Postmaster General's office as will enable the Government to curb and stop the flow of seditious and anti-American propaganda that every day pours through the mails; most of it at second-class postal rates. More harm is done to the morale of the country by this insidious publication and distribution of such matter than by the torch and bomb of the plotters and spies. It may be said it would curb the freedom of written and printed speech. If one can not, in these crucial days, when the Huns are battering at the gates of civilization, speak well of his country, he ought to close his mouth, and if he will not do so, then the arm of the Government, the sovereign right of the people, should compel him to do so. We have no rights in time of war except such rights as are subject to the higher rights of the Nation. "The safety of the people is the supreme law." [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, can the Chair inform me how much time the gentleman from Illinois just used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded back two minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Chair know how many minutes he used?

The CHAIRMAN. He used 33 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I introduced in the House a bill that ought to appeal to its entire membership. It provides for the employment by the Government of disabled soldiers and sailors and gives them a preferential status under present civil-service laws.

The bill does not seek to load the public service of the United States with incompetents. None of the established safeguards of the civil service are in the least weakened and none abrogated. It simply proposes that the Government shall show its gratitude to the men who have offered their bodies as a living rampart against the overrunning of this world by the German barbarians, and have suffered wounds and injuries thereby which place these men at a disadvantage in the keen competition of ordinary life.

The Government has work to be done. It needs thousands of workers in clerical positions. This bill undertakes to substantially recognize the debt we are under to these men, and requires that, all other things being equal, and there being no doubt of the competency and ability of the wounded man to discharge the duties of the position, he shall be given the preference in the selection.

Other countries in this war are utilizing their wounded and disabled men—England, France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Canada, New Zealand—according to their capabilities. It appears to be an act of justice very generally recognized.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is discussing one of the most important items of legislation that will be offered in this Congress. There is a joint committee now carrying on hearings, and here are only a few Members in the House, and I am going to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will not make it, because I am about through.

Mr. FESS. It is the only time I have ever done so since I have been here, but there are so few Members here now——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I sincerely hope the gentleman will not do so.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently a quorum is not present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 11692, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 269 Members answered to their names, and that he presented therewith the names of the absentees for printing in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has six minutes remaining.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. SEARS. I notice with a great deal of pleasure the interest which the able Representative from Mississippi is taking in this matter, and I would like to ask him if he has considered the feasibility or the advisability of incorporating his suggestion in the bill introduced by Senator HOKE SMITH and myself for the rehabilitation of soldiers?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I will say to the gentleman that I would be very glad if the idea embodied in my bill could be embodied in the bill known as the Smith-Sears bill. I can not see why it could not all be put together.

Mr. SEARS. I would like the gentleman to better those, as he has been attending some of these hearings and I know is interested in the matter.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. This Congress will shortly be called upon to consider and enact a comprehensive system of vocational reeducation and rehabilitation of men who have been injured in the armed forces of the United States. Those men, however maimed their poor bodies may be, are among our most precious assets, for, enshrined in their hearts, the sacred flame of liberty illuminates the shrine of justice, democracy, and love of country. They have suffered and bled for these things. In the long years of slothful peace to come, the example and the spirit of these men will go far toward keeping us in the straight road leading to our ideals. So, where a man returns broken in body, we are going to salvage him; give him the very best care that medical science and experience can give; repair him as far as is possible, and educate him to do something for a living—something he can do well, despite his handicap.

Necessarily clerical work will occupy a large place in a system designed for men physically unfitted for work requiring considerable strength or activity or endurance. It is more than likely there will be special courses of training designed to fit those capable of taking civil-service examinations and able to perform the various sorts of clerical work this Government is constantly in the market for.

Is it too much to ask the healthy, husky, able person who has never passed into the valley of the shadow of death, and through the veritable inferno of the battle front, to stand aside and give precedence to the maimed remnant of manhood who has endured those things, who has fought the good fight, and now drags his broken body back to the shores of the country he has helped save?

The chief trouble of these disabled men is the fear that they have become useless—that they are mere wrecks cast by the red tide of war on the shores of time, there to slowly disintegrate. The knowledge that they can do useful work despite their handicaps, the conviction that they are yet of use in the world, heartens them and gives them a new lease on life.

It is proper, therefore, that the Government which is reeducating them and fitting them to take their places again as useful members of society should set the example in giving them employment.

Our Labor Department and the placement division of the reeducation work will soon be issuing patriotic appeals for opportunities for employment for the returned men who have been wounded and refitted for usefulness in this and that line of endeavor.

We had better set the example ourselves to the private employers of labor, and we can with clean hands and clear conscience then make our appeal for justice for the wounded men; not charity but justice, in affording them an opportunity to make a living once more. [Applause.]

I yield back any time I have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it pains me to do what I am about to do now, but those of us who are afflicted with the divine afflatus and who burn the midnight oil, must find an outlet even if we impose on our colleagues in this House. The lines which I am now about to recite, written in the vernacular of the street, have no personal application. If they have any title at all, they might be called "Doggerel on a Dog Fight." [Laughter.]

With this brief prefatory statement, I will proceed. [Applause.]

I.

If you was a slacker of high degree,
And welched on a liberty bond, tax free,
An' ye couldn't get over to "Gay Paree"
For a sweil old time like ye used to, see!
What'd ye do, bo,
What'd ye do?
Would ye sit in yer corner and write a note
A-beggin' the words of the late Rufus Choate,
And tell yer "damned" Congressman how he should vote?
You betcha!

II.

If you was a worker that wouldn't work
And ye hated the feller that didn't shirk,
And ye heard a lip-patriot talk like a Turk,
What'd ye do, bo,
What'd ye do?
Would ye call in yer reekin' calamity crew
And give 'em a rope and a drink'er two,
And say, "Uncle Sammy, I done it fer you"?
You betcha!

III.

If you was chased by a million spies
That danced in yer ears and bulged yer eyes,
And made ye see glass in yer cranberry pies,
What'd ye do, bo,
What'd ye do?
Would ye even it up with the folks next door,
And tell the fly cops to go in an' explore
An honest man's home, for munitions of war?
You betcha!

IV.

If you was in wrong with all of the boys,
And they didn't fall fer yer kind a' noise,
And ye just sort'a lost yer equipoise,
What'd ye do, bo,
What'd ye do?
Would ye call 'em traitors and take yer stand
At the White House gate with yer flag in hand,
And pose as a patriot noble and grand?
You betcha!

V.

Or if they needed ye in the ranks
And ye sent yer relations, all, with thanks,
And the juice ran down in yer hot-air tanks,
What'd ye do, bo,
What'd ye do?

[Laughter.]

Would ye shout yer buncombe over the sea,
And grabbing the Starry Banner, free,
Still pull down yer pay from the Treasuree?
You betcha!

[Laughter.]

VI.

Maybe ye would, but disposed to do right
And help, with the rest of us, win this great fight,
Forgettin' the lure of the calcium light,
Here's what ye'd do, bo,
Here's what ye'd do:
Y' would stand by the job 'til the big work was done,
Giving cheer and support to the man with the gun,
Keepin' all the ranks closed 'til the triumph was won,
That's what ye'd do, bo,
That's what ye'd do.

[Applause.]

MORAL.

Here's the moral, good friends, this recital would teach:
Let us rather make good than rely upon speech,
Instead of self-praise and the splitting of hair
Keep busy and back up the boys "over there."

The cheapest of patriots under the sun
Is the fakir who brags about what he has done;
But meaner than he is the sanctified sort,
Who plays up suspicion to stand well at court.

True patriots, then, will first yield to the Nation,
No matter how high or how low is their station;
And standing together, grown stronger and wiser,
Make victory sure o'er His Menace the Kaiser.

[Loud applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back six minutes.

Mr. MEEKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEEKER. Is this field day in the District?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry, he will state to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY].

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I will use the five minutes, but I would like to have this letter read for the benefit of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

826 SOUTH DAKOTA STREET,
Butte, Mont., April 26, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM J. CARY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the members of the Good Government Club of Silver Bow County and the Boosters' Clubs of the city of Butte, State of Montana, respectfully call your attention, and through you the attention of the entire delegation of your State in the United States Congress, to the resolution unanimously adopted by the above-mentioned bodies relative to the treatment accorded our first Congresswoman from the State of Montana by the self-appointed and self-constituted committee of superpatriots, who in defiance of the provisions of various war measures duly passed by our Sixty-fifth Congress and approved by the President of the United States, assumed the power to interfere with the Government in its prosecution of the war through their attempted prevention of the presentation of the cause of our Government in this the third liberty loan by the aforementioned Congresswoman, Miss JEANETTE RANKIN.

In spite of the treatment accorded Miss RANKIN, she earnestly urged that the petty tyranny of local autocrats might not interfere with the enthusiasm for this war for world democracy. She pleaded against any feelings of bitterness toward the Government because the taxpayers of Silver Bow County had been denied the right to use their own school building for a patriotic meeting. Her eloquent appeal for the third liberty loan was enthusiastically cheered and liberally responded to by the purchase of liberty bonds by the shivering crowd.

The resolutions as unanimously adopted read as follows:

"We citizens, residents, and voters of the county of Silver Bow, State of Montana, through the Good Government Club and the Boosters' Clubs, hereby adopt the following resolutions:

"We most heartily condemn and disapprove of the action of the committee having in charge the meeting held in the Broadway Theater on Wednesday evening, April 17, 1918. Despite the fact that Miss JEANETTE RANKIN, who is the duly elected Representative of the State of Montana to the National Congress, was here on the said night speaking in behalf of the third liberty loan, the committee in charge, and particularly the chairman, refused to allow Miss RANKIN to address the meeting. Not only that, but the committee, through its chairman, absolutely prevented Miss RANKIN from making a speech on the third liberty loan in the auditorium of the Butte High School after arrangements had been made for same.

"We wish to call the attention of all citizens to the fact that the Butte High School was built and is being maintained by the citizens and taxpayers of Silver Bow County, Mont., and that the auditorium of the high school is used and should be used on all occasions as a public forum. The committee, through its chairman, compelled Miss RANKIN to speak on a 1-inch rail of the high school fence in the slush and cold of a raw April night.

"We believe that while we are fighting the autocracy of Europe we should not be ground under the heel of the local autocracy of Silver Bow County, Mont. As we are dedicating our lives and property to the cause of democracy in Europe, we should dedicate a little of our efforts to see that democracy is kept alive at home.

"The noble work which the women of America are doing in this war in the selling of liberty bonds, thrift stamps, in Young Men's Christian Association work, Red Cross work, and the giving of their sons to fight the battles of democracy is enough to guarantee the women of this country the right of franchise and of free speech, without the prevention by alleged patriots who are attempting to regulate the business of the war to their selfish purpose.

"The boasted chivalry of American manhood, which we have been taught from our mothers' lips, was sadly lacking at Wednesday evening's action of the local committee in charge of the third liberty loan, and we feel that Butte has suffered a disgrace thereby unparalleled in all her history."

BOOSTER CLUBS OF BUTTE, MONT.
GOOD GOVERNMENT CLUB OF SILVER BOW COUNTY,
By Mrs. H. N. KENNEDY, President.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. What does the gentleman, who has had the communication read to the House, propose to do about it?

Mr. CARY. I asked that it be read for the information of the Members of the House. As a Member of the House I thought the lady was entitled to that.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman propose any action on the part of the House?

Mr. CARY. Not at all. It was just for the information of the House.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, events have shown that in August, 1914, the only great nation in the world prepared for war was the Empire of Germany. Universal military service, extending through more than two full generations, had made its man power immediately available. It was the greatest manufacturer of munitions and scientific weapons that the world has ever seen, and the Krupp cannon and the Mauser rifle had made it the profit taker of every war. It lived in an atmosphere of militarism. Its roads, its bridges, its canals, its railway lines, its rivers and harbors, its laboratories, its manufactories, its industrial system, its natural resources, even its foreign-trade relations, were all constructed, adjusted, and developed in anticipation of "the day" when it should feel strong enough to make war upon civilization.

No nation was threatening the safety or integrity of the German Empire. No nation was in a position to threaten it. Thus the page of history is clearly written.

By the same logic of events we now know that of all the great nations in the world the least prepared for war on that day was the United States of America. We had no adequate Army. Our Army numbered barely 85,000 men for a Nation of a hundred million people—too small to police our shortest international border on the Rio Grande. And yet that Army had grown in expense as it had decreased in relative value until it was costing this country every year 50 per cent as much as the 5,000,000 armed defenders of Germany.

We had no adequate Navy. We had endowed our Navy with appropriations more liberally than any nation except England, the mistress of the seas, and yet we were told that we were in fourth or fifth place and that we could not successfully defend either the Atlantic or Pacific coast.

We had no merchant marine. The American flag had all but disappeared from the trade routes of the world. All of the surplus products of our country, all of the output of the energy and enterprise of our people must find its way abroad to market in foreign ships. We were excluded from the neutral markets of the world except as we could serve as hewers of wood and drawers of water for our commercial masters in Europe.

We were a debtor Nation. Millions of our securities were held abroad. Every year it was necessary for us to send tribute across the water to redeem the interest on our debt, and if we could not pay in cash, as ordinarily we could not, we had to pay in raw materials—wheat, cotton, lumber, oil—draining our natural resources to feed the capital and labor of Europe. We were not adjusted to the full poise and power of an independent nation.

It is useless to inquire at this time who, if anyone, was to blame for this condition of national flabbiness. To my way of thinking, not the wildest flight of the imagination could charge it to the fault of the present administration. We may as well assume that the whole American people were to blame. The truth is that we had not been thinking along those lines. We had been engaged in developing a vast, undeveloped continent, and had not given our attention to the subject of national defense.

Germany is a nation of 65,000,000 people, inhabiting a restricted territory of somewhat limited natural resources. The United States is a Nation of 100,000,000 people, inhabiting a boundless empire of almost untouched natural resources. Our people are just as intelligent, just as resolute, and just as skillful as the inhabitants of Germany, and it is manifest that with an equal degree of thought and preparation this country, single handed, is more than a match for the German Empire in any national contest. [Applause.]

So the fact was that on that day we were less able to defend ourselves against an unprovoked attack than any nation that has ever claimed an independent national existence. When I say an "independent national existence" I mean one not guaranteed by treaties of neutrality, for we all know now what such treaties are worth.

When the blow fell, in the providence of God it did not fall first upon us. If it had, untold suffering and disaster would have resulted before we could have restored the balance. We would have restored the balance. We would have driven every invader from American soil and preserved inviolate every American right, but it would have been at fearful cost of blood and treasure.

It is true we had begun to realize somewhat our need for national unity and strength. We had created the Shipping Board for the purpose of attempting to restore in an experimental way the merchant marine. We had created the Federal Reserve System to abolish panics and to place 12 great reservoirs of credit at the service of American commerce. And we had created the Tariff Commission, designed to take the tariff out of politics and to study in a scientific way the great interchange of commodities between nations and its effect upon industrial progress.

But no steps had been taken toward adequate national defense, except the passage of the national-defense act in June, 1916, which had not had time to go into effective operation prior to our entrance into the war.

When on the 6th day of April, 1917, we entered this war against the most scientific enemy the world has ever seen we were armed only with that magnificent and irrepressible optimism or egotism, whichever we may choose to call it, which is such a distinguishing trait of the American character. It is the feeling that Uncle Sam "can lick the hull of creation," with one hand tied behind his back. It is a valuable trait; we would not be without it for the world. It is responsible for much of our enterprise and our success; but it is not the only weapon that soldiers need in such a war as we had challenged.

We had to create an army after war was declared. Nay, we had to create a military system adapted to the needs of a free people, for we could not even build upon the foundation stone of the Army that we had. It was not a question of increasing the size of the standing Army, for no standing Army would have been adequate to the emergency.

I remember nearly a year before war was declared we had a spirited debate in the House of Representatives, which grew quite bitter at times, over the question whether the standing Army of the United States, a Nation of a hundred million people, should consist of 175,000 or 225,000 men. It hardly seems possible that men could get excited over so small a difference of opinion, yet those of us who voted for the higher number were denounced as "dangerous militarists." Now, we know that neither 175,000 nor 225,000 men are sufficient to storm the enemy's trenches before breakfast in the morning in such a war as we are now waging.

Finally, the solution of the problem came to us and came to the thought of the Nation, and that was that every qualified man of military age was part of the fighting force of his country. If a country is worth having, it is worth defending, and if it is worth defending it is as much one man's duty to defend it as it is another man's duty.

We must have a military system based upon the whole man asset of the Nation, as our banking system is based upon the whole commercial asset of the Nation, and capable of contracting and expanding as the demand upon it diminishes or increases. This is the only military system worthy of a free and intelligent people. They told us that we could not raise an army by selective conscription in the United States; that the people would not submit to such a system; that it would take an army to raise an army, and therefore Uncle Sam could never have an army; that if we attempted to enforce conscription there would not be jails enough in the country to hold the draft resisters, and we would have to build stockades and bull pens to keep the prisoners in.

Ah, the men who so argued and who so thought had failed utterly to sound the profound depth of patriotism of the American heart! We did try conscription; the 5th day of June, 1917, is a red-letter day in the annals of the American Republic—a day that will be taught to school children from now on to the end of time. On that day, on a single day, between the rising of the sun and the going down of the same, in a Nation of a hundred million people scattered over 3,000 miles of territory, in 48 sovereign States, nearly 10,000,000 red-blooded young Americans stepped forward from the ranks of the people and enrolled themselves to defend the same flag! Where were those draft resisters? Why, there were not enough of them among a hundred million people to get up a real good, first-class street-corner brawl. The great mass of the American people was loyal to the core.

Where is the country, large or small, that ever put the patriotism of its people to such a test? All the annals of history reveal no parallel. On that day the life of the Republic was thrown into the hands of its citizens. The right of democracy to survive among men was put to its supreme test. We said to the Nation: "This day, from the time the sun rises in the east until it sets in the west, there is no sovereign over the heads of the American people. You are in the presence of our armed foe. Your flag has gone into battle. Come forward and defend it. If you do not defend it, it will go down. If any considerable number of you resist, your Government has not the bayonets to force you into subjection. The fate of free government is in your hands."

Thank God for the spontaneous and loyal response of the American people. It was worth being alive to see. Every nation, the oldest, the richest, the proudest, has its dark corners, its disaffected sections, where the mandate of the law must sometimes stay its hand—every nation but our own. The even hand of equal democratic justice can reach into every nook and corner of Uncle Sam's vast domain under the light of a single sun. [Applause.]

On this principle of democratic equality our army was formed. And such an army! Drawn from every home and every fireside in this land; from every trade and occupation; from every race, from every kindred, and from every tribe that make up our people. I have seen that army in a score of camps throughout the United States; and I say to you that for courage, for discipline, for intelligence, for moral character, no finer body of men was ever gathered under any flag in the history of the world than will fight the battles of democracy under Old Glory for Uncle Sam. [Applause.] I place that army on your hearts and commend it to your prayers. [Applause.]

We were fortunate in this crisis in our Nation's history in having in the White House as the executive head of our Government a man big enough to grasp big problems in a big way, and who has shown himself in every emergency a big leader of a big people—Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States. [Applause.]

That army needed arms and equipment. All the resources of the Nation are pledged to its support. Our boys can not fight barehanded. Without ample weapons the most reckless courage that ever fired the heart of man would never reach the front line of the enemy's trenches in such a war as this. It needed rifles and ammunition, artillery and shells, blankets and tentage, hospital supplies and medicine, food and uniforms, motor trucks and transportation and aeroplanes and submarines, and ships, and transports, and convoys, and submarine chasers.

During the summer of 1917 the problems of preparation rolled in upon Congress like a veritable tidal wave. We had not only to create an Army, we had to officer it, and train it, and house it, and feed it, and clothe it, and arm it, and equip it, and transport it. And coincident therewith we had to find the money for financing these unprecedented expenses.

All this takes money. I would not vote, I repeat, I would not vote to conscript American boys and send them to the firing line in France to risk their lives and limbs in defense of their flag—perhaps to pay the last supreme sacrifice that a man can pay—and then refuse to send after them every dollar of American money necessary to make them victorious and successful in the struggle in which they are engaged.

In the last few months full many a noble-hearted American mother, with a brave smile on her lips, has stood at the door of her little home and waved a smiling "good-by" to her boy until he disappeared in the turn of the road, and then she has gone back into his silent bedchamber and buried her face in his empty pillow and sobbed out the anguish of her soul before the throne of Almighty God. Thousands of us have seen the smiling good-by from the doorway, but perhaps only the Great Father of us all has viewed the scene in the little bedchamber. I feel and believe that there was no bitterness in that mother's tears. There was even a high pride and joy that her boy could go and did go and wanted to go to do a man's part when his country called him. She would not have called him back if she could, nor would she have had him falter and turn back for anything on earth. There was just one thought, one wish in that mother's heart—that the arms of a mother's love might be around him as he went into camp; that he might be cared for and protected to the limit of human fidelity.

She can not provide for her boy in camp, but you and I can do it, and we must do it. It would be a crime upon our souls if that Army of ours met disaster by the negligence, the selfishness, or the cowardice of those in power. All the sacrifice of this war must not fall on the boys who go to the trenches. There is a large measure of sacrifice for those of us who remain at home. They are fighting our battles. They are defending our flag. They are saving our institutions, and no sacrifice on our part is too great to measure theirs.

We are going to conscript not only your boys, we are going to conscript your money; we are going to conscript your love and your sympathy and your prayers.

I should like to enter in detail into the problems of preparedness. We hear so much of the few things that have not been done that we lose sight of the mighty miracles that have been wrought. Suffice it to say that every American soldier that lands on the soil of France and goes to the front under the command of that gallant Missourian, Gen. John J. Pershing, will be better armed and equipped from top to toe than any soldier that ever set foot in tented field since the dawn of history. We had no illusions on the subject of the magnitude of the task when we entered this war. We knew that three years was the minimum in which to bring the contest to a successful conclusion. We knew it would take one full year to create and place an Army in the field, and we knew it would take at least that long to arouse public spirit and provide what may be called the mental equipment of the Nation. We knew it would take a full year to turn Uncle Sam—good-natured, easy-going, indulgent old Uncle Sam—into a first-class fighting man; and it has taken a year. We knew it would take the full season of 1918 to fight, if possible, a few successful battles, and we knew it would take the full year of 1919 to bring about a satisfactory peace. At that time the collapse of Russia had not taken place. In that regard the situation is less favorable, and Germany may be stronger to-day than when we declared war. We do not count upon the backdown of Germany, and we may as well let her know that we listen to no such insidious whisperings.

We count upon the righteous wrath of an aroused and powerful people to meet her and match her and overmatch her in the field. It will be time enough to talk peace when the armies of the Hun are sent hurling back through France and through Belgium to within the confines of Germany.

Thousands of our boys are to-day on the firing line in France. Thousands are on the gray Atlantic. Thousands more are in the training camps ready to go. For many of them the time has already arrived when we may not draw aside the veil of silence and tell the people even where those boys are or how they fare. With that time at hand, with those boys facing the bullets of the foe in front, they have a right to feel that you and I will see to it that they are in no danger of an attack from the rear; that you and I will not permit any set of people back here to pour the poison of sedition into the veins of good old Uncle Sam.

During all of this time when the life of the Nation was in peril, when the storm of war was gathering over the head of our devoted country, when our safety was menaced by foes within and without, when true patriots were drawing closer together that we might know who stood for "America first," there were not lacking those who sought to confuse public opinion, to tear down American ideals, to becloud the luster of American honor, to destroy the unity and strength of the American Nation, and to spread doubt, discord, and class hatred among our people. They sought to array the farmer against the city man, the laborer against his employer, and the foreign born against the native born—anything to foster discontent and to weaken the arm of Uncle Sam.

A widespread, insistent, and insidious propaganda was carried on to this end. We may know by evidence in the possession of our Government where this propaganda originated and how it was carried on. Some of the propositions were very plausible and deceived many good men. While the danger was at its height I got hundreds of letters and telegrams from my own district on these various propositions. Some of them were from people in whom I had the utmost confidence. I did not assume that my sense of patriotism was a bit higher than theirs, but I did know that I stood a little higher up the mountain side and had a little wider sweep of the horizon, and could see a little clearer where these propositions came from. They all came from the same sinister source and all tended to the same disgraceful end.

The first proposal was that Congress should declare an embargo. They wanted us to close American ports, to destroy our commerce, to let our goods rot upon the wharves, to sit down in bankruptcy and despair, and for what purpose? In order that the nation that had deliberately prepared for this war should have an insuperable advantage over the nations that had to buy their supplies!

Then it was urged that we refuse to permit merchant vessels to arm against the pirate submarine—for the submarine is a pirate. It is not a vessel of war. It is not a part of a fleet. It does not go out seeking an armed enemy. It never attacks an armed ship if it knows it. It attacks unarmed ships, ships of commerce, loaded with merchandise, with passengers, with women and children.

Then we were asked to forbid American citizens from traveling on armed vessels of commerce, and this meant that we should become a hermit Nation, that our people could not travel abroad at all, for we had no merchant marine, and our sole reliance in most cases for foreign travel was upon the ships of the English and the French.

In a similar way, it was urged that we should in no event send troops abroad to fight the enemy, that we should wait until murder and rapine were brought to our very dooryard. I can not believe that any right-thinking man really wants to see that. For my own part, as long as I have any official responsibility in the destiny of this Nation, we shall be prepared to meet and defeat every foe beyond the bounds of our own country.

Congress has indignantly repelled all of these suggestions and has kept its eye fixed upon the bright guidon of national unity and national honor.

To me the parting of the ways came more than a year before the declaration of war. On the 24th of February, 1916, a former chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate of the United States wrote to President Wilson demanding that American citizens be forbidden to travel on armed ships of commerce. President Wilson refused, and in that refusal he struck what is to me the high note of American statesmanship and American honor. The President pointed out that he had thus far succeeded in keeping the country out of war, and that the people well understood his purpose in that regard, but that the undersea campaign of the Germanic allies was making it increasingly difficult to maintain peace with honor under the rules of international law; that the acts of the rulers of Germany were so widely different from their promises that it was difficult to reconcile the one with the other, but that he still hoped that some explanation might be found for their conduct.

He then continues:

> But in any event our duty is clear. No nation, no group of nations, has the right while war is in progress to alter or disregard the principles which all nations have agreed upon in mitigation of the horrors and sufferings of war, and if the clear rights of American citizens should ever unhappily be abridged or denied by any such action we should, it seems to me, have in honor no choice as to what our own course should be. For my own part I can not consent to any abridgment of the rights of American citizens in any respect. The honor and self-respect of the Nation are involved. We covet peace and shall preserve it at any cost but the loss of honor. To forbid our people to exercise their rights for fear we might be called upon to vindicate them would be a deep humiliation, indeed.

Aye, it would. To say to an American citizen that he may not exercise the rights of a citizen of a sovereign State; that he may not travel beyond the bounds of his own country upon errands of commerce, upon errands of science, upon errands of mercy, or even as the diplomatic or consular representative of his own Government except at the peril of his life, for fear, forsooth, that his Government might be called upon to vindicate his rights as a citizen, would be an indelible stain upon American honor.

Why, a year before that, on May 13, 1915, after the sinking of the Lusitania, when we warned Germany that she must not attack noncombatants on the high seas, our Secretary of State presented the same principle. He said:

> American citizens act within their indisputable rights in taking their ships and in traveling wherever their legitimate business calls them upon the high seas, and exercise those rights in what should be the well-justified confidence that their lives will not be endangered by acts done in clear violation of universally acknowledged international obligations, and certainly in the confidence that their own Government will sustain them in the exercise of their rights.

Why, when the blow fell, it became apparent that the path of dishonor would not have been the path of safety. On February 1, 1917, the Imperial German Government issued its mandate that it purposed to sink all ships, armed and unarmed, friendly and belligerent, without regard to their character, their contents, or their destination, if it found them upon the high seas. When that occurred, when the black flag had been hoisted against civilization, the President of the United States came before Congress and he gave it one clear message. The men of Congress, without regard to political affiliations, responded with one vote and the American people have ratified it with one voice, and that is that the sovereign rights of American citizens shall be protected anywhere against any nation on earth! [Applause.]

When we entered this war, therefore, we entered for the defense of the undoubted rights of the American people under every principle of international law; rights we were able to defend when we were a weak and struggling Nation, and are we less able to defend them now that we have grown strong and great? We are for peace; but as President Wilson has said, the right is more precious than peace. If it were not so, we would not to-day be the independent Nation that we are.

We fought England, our motherland, a second time in 1812 for less outrages upon our citizens at sea than we have suffered at the hands of the German Empire. England never claimed the right to sink our ships, to destroy our property, to murder our citizens. All she ever claimed was the right to search our ships for deserters from her own navy, and we would not even permit her to do that, although she was the nearest blood relative we had on the globe.

There were high-minded men in this country that thought we should have gone to war when Belgium was invaded. There were dauntless spirits who thought we should have intervened when the Lusitania was sunk; but the great majority of the American people preferred to tread the path of peace and neutrality as long as it could be trod with honor. But when we entered this war on the 6th day of April, 1917, we entered clothed not only with the white garment of humanity but with the invincible armor of a strict legal right under every acknowledged principle of international law. This is America's war whether it is anybody else's war or not. Let there be no confusion of thought in any man's mind on that subject.

Our Army goes abroad primarily in vindication of American rights, rights as old as the history of our Republic. But it so chances in the mighty movements of the world's history that our boys go with another and a higher mission. They are the foremost champions and natural defenders of the cause of democracy, the rights of humanity, and the safety of free institutions. We find ourselves allied with all the free governing nations of the world, opposed to the last remnant of autocracy and the miserable sacrilege of the divine right of kings to rule their fellow men.

Democracy must demonstrate its right to live, and to do this it must demonstrate its power to live. It is manifest that if a military autocracy is the only strong and efficient form of government, if it is able to impose its will upon other nations, then it is the only safe form of government, and all men must come under a military autocracy. Democracy can only survive by proving that it is stronger than any other form of government, that it has a stronger hold upon the hearts and minds and purses of its citizens than feudalism.

I am enough of an American to believe that free government can not perish from the earth; that Americans to-day are imbued with the spirit of '76 and are ready to devote "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" upon the altar of their country's cause. One hundred and forty years ago, when our fathers founded this little Nation upon the fundamental principle of the equal opportunity of all men before the law, some of the boldest of them may have dreamed that it would one day grow into an independent Nation.

But I take it that not even the wildest dreamer among them would have imagined that it would grow into the great, powerful, rich Nation into which it has grown. Equity and opportunity have drawn to these shores millions of liberty-loving men from every land and clime. Loyalty is not a matter of race or creed or lineage or birth; it is a matter of the heart. The true American is loyal to American ideals. The immigrant's son when he puts on the khaki uniform and shoulders his rifle and marches away under the Old Flag of the Union is just as good an American as the man who counts six generations to the Pilgrim Fathers of New England.

I affirm that if there is any man in America who really believes in the divine right of kings to rule their fellow men, he does not belong under the Stars and Stripes. He ought to get under some other flag. [Applause.]

When our fathers founded this Republic upon the principle of the equal right of all men to govern themselves and to choose the form of government under which they should live not a nation on earth was willing to admit that we could make a success of it. To-day four-fifths of the civilized nations are glad to join hands with us upon the American platform of the rights of man. The American principle has become the dominant political thought of the age.

Our boys will not fight alone. They will fight for the first time in our history with our motherland of England and with our Canadian cousins, from whom we have been too long estranged. They will fight with France—gallant old France! That came so promptly to our aid in the days of our Revolutionary struggle; that sent us Lafayette and Rochambeau; that lent to our starving and destitute Nation millions of money and waited our good time to pay it back, and then remitted all the interest. They will fight with Italy, the home of art and song; with Belgium, bleeding Belgium, ravished to-day by the Huns; with Poland, dreary, desolate Poland, where, under the benign influence of Prussian kultur, all the little children under 10 years of age are dead and rotting by the roadside; with Christian Armenia, ground beneath the bloody heel of the unspeakable Turk; and with Russia, that great Empire just emerging from the darkness of ignorance and misrule into the sunlight of self-government. But if this great Republic with 140 years of freedom can not defend its principles and its people, why should Russia care to be a republic after all?

Our boys will fight under no feudal banner, under no royal ensign, under no flag typifying the divine right of kings to rule. They will fight under Old Glory, the flag of the free. Those boys are imbued with the spirit of 1776. If we support them, they will defend that Old Flag and carry it to victory. They will restore it to us with added luster and added glory. They will not stain it with inhumanity or dishonor, and they will not bring it back until they have made the Kaiser see the Stars and feel the Stripes of a free people.

What that Old Flag means to us we want it to mean to all the world. We have seen that flag through all the dark days of our infant struggle, through starvation and suffering, through privation and peril, through disaster and defeat, until the black midnight of Valley Forge burst into the cloudless dawn at Yorktown. We have seen it wave in victory over Perry at Lake Erie and above the dauntless achievements of Andrew Jackson at New Orleans. We have seen it triumph at Monterey, at Buena Vista, at Cerro Gordo, and at Chapultepec. We have seen it sway to and fro in the mighty storm of the Civil War. We have seen it at the high-water mark of that great struggle upon the field of Gettysburg, where for three long days under the burning sun of July the brothers who wore the blue and the brothers who wore the gray hurled themselves against each other in fratricidal strife until they had proven to themselves and to all the world that they were one in courage, one in race, and one, thank God, in destiny.

We have seen it with Dewey at Manila Bay and with Sampson and Schley at Santiago. And we shall soon see that same Old Flag ,a star of hope to the suffering world, carried in triumph across the bleeding fields of France and Belgium, until it is planted in victory and in permanent peace above the last stronghold of feudal power in this world.

Will peace come? Aye; peace will come, but it will be no premature peace; it will be no patched-up peace; it will be no armed truce leading to another awful struggle. It will be no peace with a despot who claims a partnership with Almighty God.

It will be no peace with a monarch who regards the most solemn international obligations as mere scraps of paper.

It will be a peace founded upon the deep faith of nations; a peace between average men; a peace sealed by the voice of the people, above and beyond which we Americans acknowledge no power beneath the throne of God.

Will peace come? When? Peace will come, as President Wilson told the Pope, when the flag of feudalism goes down forever in this world. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, before beginning I ask unanimous consent to extend, revise, and correct my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend, revise, and correct his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, many of us here in the House have at one time and another been deeply interested in the question of our soldiers' mails. We have seen one department, in the parlance of the day, pass the buck to another department in an effort to evade the responsibility for an unaccountable delay in the transmission of mail to our boys who are now over there. To my utter surprise and consternation I read in the newspaper a few days ago that an American general, who had been interviewed on this question of soldiers' mail, said that the disturbance which was being raised here in the Congress of the United States was all uncalled for, was a waste of time, and that so far as his men were concerned they were there to fight and not to read letters from home.

Now, I rise at this moment particularly to bring to the attention of the House by contrast the statement of a Massachusetts colonel, now in France, who headed the first State unit of militiamen that ever left this country for service in the present European struggle.

On the 7th day of last September a Massachusetts regiment sailed from an American port. I had the proud distinction and the great privilege of witnessing the departure of that fine regiment of boys from the old Bay State; its colonel has been my lifelong friend; its present membership is composed of what was originally two Massachusetts State militia organizations. As I said before, it was the first State organization to leave America for this war. It is known now as the One hundred and first Infantry. It was formerly the Fighting Ninth and the Dandy Fifth of Massachusetts. Its colonel, Edward L. Logan, a brave, self-sacrificing, devoted young Bostonian, who had graduated from Harvard College, who had acquired a splendid law practice, left here at the head of that regiment, and his regiment was selected because at that time it was the only State regiment in this country which was ready for foreign service. I do not say this in disparagement of the other splendid State troops which have since embarked from these shores, but it even preceded the Rainbow Division about which we have heard so much and from which we have heard so much since the Rainbow Division was sent to France.

For almost eight months these boys from my State have been under the colors in war-torn France. After months of daily instruction in the very latest tactics of modern warfare they were sent to the firing line some eight weeks past. Day and night their gallant colonel has lived with his men and has worked for his men. He ought to know, and he does know, how his men feel on this question of letters from home. His men, their comfort, their well-being, their happiness, under prevailing conditions, are his first concern. He stands by his men all the time and they loyally and devotedly stand by him.

What does Col. Edward L. Logan say in contrast to the Regular Army general, who says that his men are in France to fight and not to read letters from home? I have the message from him, and he lays particular emphasis on this question of the soldiers' mail. Yesterday word came from Col. Logan, and speaking of his boys, most of whom live in my congressional district, I am proud to say, he says:

> Tell the mothers that I am doing my best to keep the boys in fine condition, and that the One hundred and first is grateful for all the things done for us by the folks back home. Say that the boys are in excellent health and spirits, but, above all, tell them over there to write and then write some more. Tell them not to wait for the boys to answer; we may be in the trenches all the time. Please tell them to keep in mind that there is nothing in the world so consoling to our boys as to hear from home.

[Applause.]

There is the story of a Massachusetts volunteer colonel now and for many months past right in the midst of things. His regiment has been in action now for over six weeks, and there has not been a single company in the regiment that has not lost some of its men. Already many of the boys have made the supreme sacrifice. Many others have been listed among the wounded. Their colonel has said the most consoling influence of all is found in the letters from those who are keeping the home fires burning. And when any colonel or any general in the American Army over there—I do not care how high or how low his station—says that his men are there to fight and not to read letters from home, I believe that some notice ought to be taken of that statement here in the Congress of the United States, even if it is but that of quoting what he has said. He ought to be jacked up and at once.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that not only is Massachusetts entitled to the honor which he has mentioned, but, according to the reports in the public press, the first body of American troops to be complimented for bravery in battle by a foreign commander was a Massachusetts body of soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska. He has but anticipated what I am going to read about another Massachusetts regiment, most of whose boys come from the district of the distinguished acting leader of the minority party, my colleague, Mr. GILLETT. "One hundred and twenty-two Massachusetts boys win crosses" read the headlines in all the press of the country yesterday. "Bravery of One hundred and fourth Regiment recognized by France."

In recognition of the bravery of Massachusetts troops in the recent battle of Apremont, the French Government has decorated 122 men, mostly of the One hundred and fourth Regiment, with the cross of war, according to dispatches from army headquarters in the field received in Boston yesterday.

Two chaplains—

One a Catholic priest and one a Protestant minister—

are among the leaders in the honor list and receive high praise in the French citation. Every rank, from captain to private, is included in the roll. The French general making the presentations, according to the dispatches, said, in speaking of the One hundred and fourth Regiment, "It showed the greatest audacity and a fine spirit of sacrifice. Subjected to very violent bombardments and attacked by large German forces, it succeeded in checking the dangerous advance, and took, at the point of the bayonet, in a most vigorous way, prisoners and some demolished trenches from which it had fallen back at the first assault."

I want to read to you what these two chaplains were especially cited for. Chaplain John B. Des Valles, of New Bedford, had this said of him by the French general:

With extraordinary heroism and exceptional devotedness to duty, under uninterrupted fire and at the constant risk of his life, he did not cease to tender aid to the wounded, and he encouraged to renewed efforts the men who were weakened in hard fighting.

He was the Catholic priest. Here is what is said of the Protestant chaplain, Walton S. Danker, of Worcester:

At the time of the attack particularly noteworthy was the devotedness and spirit of sacrifice with which he attended the sick and wounded and bestowed the last rite to the dead. Facing the enemy from April 2 to April 14, particularly on April 10, 12, and 13, he remained in the front-line trenches, encouraging the men during the clash.

Those are two Massachusetts clergymen. God bless them and keep them! I said that practically the entire One hundred and fourth came from the district of the distinguished minority leader [Mr. GILLETT], yet I ought not to forget that perhaps every district in Massachusetts can claim some of these boys, and I am glad to be able in this hour to bring to the attention of Congress—and I am thankful to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] for suggesting it to me—that this great honor has been conferred on a body of Massachusetts brave boys, and I do not believe that in the history of any war any such distinction ever came at such an early time in the conflict to any regiment.

Col. Logan's regiment has also had honors bestowed on many officers and privates. The war crosses appear on the uniforms of many of his brave boys, and, oh! how proud my people are of that regiment, first State unit to go overseas and first to reach the firing line.

Mr. Chairman, as I said I rose to refer to the question of soldiers' mail, and to quote what Col. Logan, of the One hundred and first Regiment, had sent home here, and I sincerely hope that the efforts of all those Members of Congress who have taken this matter up will not fail.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I notice in yesterday's Boston Post a report of the return of the Massachusetts mission sent over there in connection with establishing a registration point for Massachusetts soldiers, and that former Lieut. Gov. Frothingham, a member of that commission, states that he found among all the Massachusetts troops and among the troops generally of the American Expeditionary Forces that the mail service was the one thing that gave them more grief and more anxiety and more trouble than any other single thing.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I want to say to my colleague that I have the same information, and in his absence I read a letter from Col. Logan, of the One hundred and first Regiment, in which he pleads that the folks at home write and keep writing and that the mail service be, if possible, improved. We all want action now.

I want to say something while I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, about the entire Postal Service to-day.

The past three or four years have seen a steady decline of service efficiency in the post office. So bad have conditions grown that complaint has come from all parts of the country and from all classes of people. Everybody knows it; everybody has felt its disturbing effects. Editorial and news columns of the public press teem with the subject; few Members of this House but what have received many letters of complaint and instance after instance has been related on this floor all tending to show the growing demoralization of the service. Something is radically wrong and it is a condition which can not be permitted to long continue unchecked.

Eventually the department, admitting that something was sadly the matter, tried to explain by laying the blame on the railroads. Of course, time schedules are out of joint, but this does not explain the wretched local delivery, nor does it explain the discouraging mail service given the soldiers abroad or in the cantonments at home. In fact, instead of the railroads being solely to blame, it can be stated with good show of reason that the excessive time consumed in discharging and loading mail at way stations, due to an inadequate working force, is largely responsible for delayed passenger-train service. We will have to look beyond the railroads to locate the trouble.

THE PROFIT IDEA.

An unbiased and impartial inquiry will lead any investigator to but one conclusion, and that is the present administrative policy of the Post Office Department is responsible for existing evil conditions. In a mad effort to force a postal surplus, and in so doing to play upon a mistaken impression held in some quarters that a profitable service means an efficient one, the Post Office Department, under the guise of economy, has instituted cheeseparing practices and penny-wise and pound-foolish methods until a heretofore excellent service has been disorganized beyond recognition.

In attempting to run the post office on a profit basis when neither the people nor Congress indorses such a policy is a grievous mistake, and to this fundamental error can be traced the multiplied shortcomings of the existing system. This fallacy has impregnated the whole structure with the idea that cost is everything, and this philosophy ramifies through and hangs like a pall over its diversified workings, affecting alike the administrative and operating ends of the business.

Instance after instance could be cited to show how fully these statements square with the facts and how, as a result, the entire service breaks down in an emergency. Instead of making a general survey of the entire service, however, I will content myself by confining these remarks to an analysis of the way the postal profit system works in practice and its ultimate effect upon the city delivery division, a part of the service with which I am most familiar. Similar conditions to those described here exist in all other branches proceeding from the same primary cause.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. In his criticism of the Post Office Department, does the gentleman not think it would be fair and proper for him to state that in the interest of the prosecution of this war, in order that the freights might have the right of way for the transmission of munitions of war and of soldiers, it has become necessary to take off about one-half of all of the mail trains heretofore used in the United States in the transmission of mail?

Mr. GALLIVAN. The gentleman has stated a fact. I am glad to get that information. I do not know what percentage of the mail trains have been taken off. I am always glad to be informed, and there is nobody in this House who can give us more information upon the subject than the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; but my criticism still holds, despite that fact. Before the war our postal system was starting on its backward course. Let us examine into some of the causes.

THE EFFICIENCY SYSTEM.

Post-office clerks and city letter carriers distribute and deliver the mails arriving at free-delivery offices, and they are employed on an eight-hour day basis. This is highly important work, and service efficiency demands that the operating plan of organization be so framed as to facilitate distribution and to insure an unfailing observance by the carrier of regular delivery schedules. Owing to the fact that the daily volume of mail varies to a certain extent, which in post-office terms are known as light and heavy days, instances occur wherein the carrier completes his regular tour of duty in time somewhat less than the full eight hours. Of course, the carrier on such days performs all the work assigned him, but some one in the department at Washington, noting these instances of "undertime"—a technical term since invented by the department to define such cases—conceived the idea that some one was loafing or shirking and at once, for obvious reasons, set about to devise a system that would eliminate "undertime."

It must be apparent to the least familiar that this would be no easy matter. Mail varies in volume, and if the carrier was allotted all he could deliver on light days, when the heavier days come, as they do three or four times a week, and especially in certain seasons on the first few days of each month, naturally he would be overwhelmed by the increased burden. The service would suffer, patrons would become discontented, and the carrier, worked to the limit on each and every day, would be lacking in energy and without reserve vitality to successfully handle the peak loads.

Prior to the system being changed the regulations governing carriers' tours of duty provided, in substance, that "all routes should be arranged so that they may be covered within eight hours." This plan worked to the satisfaction of all concerned; efficient service was given; patrons received their mail at regular intervals; and the health and vitality of the employees was kept at a high standard. Despite this gratifying showing, the efficiency experts at Washington demanded a change and change it must be.

THE STANDARD DAY.

Before the new system was placed in operation, however, the department mailed an order which, through the local postmasters, instructed the carriers to furnish certain data, which they were themselves to compile. This data consisted of the number of first, second, third, and fourth class pieces of mail handled on certain days, as well as the number of pieces of postage-due mail and registered matter. Once secured, such data became the basis of calculation on which the efficiency system was later founded.

Here is the way it was done: Adding the several items of mail handled and then dividing the total by the number of carriers and you have the average amount of mail, cased and delivered, per carrier per day.

So far so good. Then add up the time consumed by all the carriers on this day and divide the total by the number of carriers and you have the average time consumed per carrier per day.

Then multiply the number of carriers by eight hours and from this figure subtract the actual number of hours worked as totaled from the records and you have as a result an imposing figure of "undertime," which, if taken among 35,000 carriers, resolves itself into a most convincing argument, favoring the inauguration of an efficiency system to conserve this time.

But this does not complete the system by any means. It is now necessary to compute the time of the carrier by offices. A force of inspectors visit a post office and, on the basis of the above calculation, compute the "undertime" that has occurred in this office during some recent period. Armed with this figure obtained, they then call upon the postmaster, have the supervisory officers brought in, and confront these officials with the damning evidence of their own infamy.

Accordingly the amount of "undertime" having been totaled, routes are ordered rearranged so as to provide for a full eight hours' work on each day. If, for instance, in an office of, say, 9 or 10 carriers, it is found that there has been a weekly average of 48 hours "undertime," it must be plainly evident in the light of this efficiency system that one of these carriers can be dispensed with. It is up to the postmasters to see that routes are rearranged so that this can be done, leaving the remaining carriers to handle the additional work after the order has been rendered effective.

Then to give the system general application and the post-office inspectors a bill of good health an order issues from the department, advising the postmaster that hereafter "carriers' routes should be so arranged as to provide a full eight hours' work at all times." Thus by a system of adding pieces of mail and men and dividing the total by minutes, the department has evolved the wonderful theory of the standard day. After all, could anything be more simple?

Why is it not a great idea? Why will it not work? It is done in the factory by increasing the size of the pulley; it is done in the machine shop by speeding up the lathe and introducing soft steel; it is done on the railroad by building larger locomotives; why can it not be done in the post office? Set a standard; that is the idea. Never mind about local conditions, train schedules, the human element, or what not. Set the standard. If conditions do not exactly fit the standard, bend and hammer and squeeze them in until they do fit. It is up to the postmaster to see that this is done.

THE STANDARD MINUTE.

Here we have the standard day as a scientific formula designating what a day's work should be. To make it further effective, it is but a natural and logical step for the local post-office authorities to subsequently divide the hour into minutes and set a standard minute's work. So they do a little computing on their own account. The stop watch is brought out; the carrier is started with a gong, and an accurate time record is taken in minutes by the watch holder of the pieces of mail he throws, the amount of time he consumes in doing this or that with one or the other class of mail, and then out of this table of experience thus compiled is evolved another theory—the standard minute.

This is not a satire, gentlemen, framed for passing amusement or a facetiously contrived plot for a literary extravaganza. Rather is it a true-to-life portrayal of a system now operating in the City Delivery Division of the Postal Service, where hard and fast regulations define an acceptable amount of work to be performed in 60 seconds. Not only is there a minute standard, but employees are reduced in grade, transferred, humiliatingly disciplined, or removed from the service, as a case may be, because they can not maintain the pace the minute standard arbitrarily sets.

THE SYSTEM AT WORK.

The Post Office Department having sponsored and sanctioned this system, it is but natural that the inspector force would shortly become saturated with the same idea. Realizing that their tenure of place depended almost entirely on the favor of the Postmaster General has caused many postmasters to catch the craze, and to such an extent that new-fangled speed-up devices, efficiency charts, rules, and regulations have followed one another with painful regularity, until it is impossible to catalogue the variety of methods thus invoked. Everything must be done by rule. Tasks are measured by minutes, minutes by seconds, and seconds by physical movements.

The robust and active carrier is singled out as the basis for computation. His capacity is utilized as a measuring device to frame the tasks set for other carriers, who with unsparing exactness must be standardized accordingly. Somehow, some way, the standard must be maintained, no matter how much speeding up is required, because he who can not stand the pace can fall by the wayside. Even instances have occurred where carriers were ordered to count the number of their steps taken during the day.

Such is the efficiency system, its origin, its history, its application. The corner stone of the system is the standard day. Its purpose is to wring from the toiler the last ounce of possible effort. Its ultimate object throughout its varied ramifications is to force a postal surplus and to prove how the present administration of the Post Office transcends in capacity all those that have gone before.

REORGANIZATION.

Such is the efficiency system. How does it work out in practice? What are the results of its operation, general and specific, immediate and remote? Answering my own question, I charge this so-called efficiency system with being an utter failure, and that, too, after judging it fairly and from every point of view. It has well-nigh destroyed the efficiency of a heretofore satisfying service; it has shaken the confidence of the people and awakened protest without end; it has goaded the employees into almost open rebellion, driven competent men from the service in despair, depressed the morale and health of the workers, and inspired a discontent that now runs rife throughout the entire structure. Even more. From a standpoint of social economy the system has been a hopeless and a disastrous financial experiment. It has ignominiously failed, first of all, because it is founded on a fallacy and because it left out of reckoning the one most important item—the human element.

Examining in detail, this is how the plan works in practice: The efficiency system has been launched; it is on its way and a reorganization of certain post offices begun—reorganization being a polite departmental term meaning reduction in the force. In due time a number of post-office inspectors show up in a particular post office where are employed, we may say, some 60 letter carriers. At once begins the scheme of scientific computation, and it is discovered that these 60 carriers have averaged 7 hours and 35 minutes per carrier per day in casing and distributing mail.

Not much "undertime" for one man, to be sure; but lo and behold, when you multiply it by 60 you have the amazing total of 1,500 minutes per day "undertime"; 1,500 minutes means 25 hours, which in turn means 3 workdays of 8 hours each, and, what is more to the point, means that three carriers, according to this system, can be dispensed with. Reorganization begins, and nothing is easier. The postmaster is simply ordered to reduce his carrier force by three men, and arrange the remaining routes accordingly. Protest unavailing, the orders are obeyed. The inspectors leave town, bent on more reorganization. The postmaster is left behind to toy with his new-found system, and then trouble, dire trouble, begins.

The first division of districts will not work at all. Many carriers have plainly too much mail to handle, so that in rectifying this inequality chunks of territory are switched back and forth from this route to that like diplomats at a peace conference, seeking vainly for some equitable plan of settlement. Meanwhile, the patron daily sees a new face at his door, and a strange voice inquires his name. Substitutes are drafted in number to care for the accumulated mail as the adjustment goes on. Still it fails, so speed-up methods are invoked. The official whip is cracked; men are nagged, hounded, and hurried; complaints pile into the office, and everything is in an uproar.

Still the system does not work, but admission of this fact can not be officially made by the postmaster who knows how the information would be received at Washington. Schedules are thrown out of joint, regularity of delivery vanishes, and mail accumulates in the office. This carrier has too much; he is hours late on his trip, so he must curtail service to one delivery a day. Another carrier is covered up, so he takes out first-class mail only, leaving an accumulation of newspapers, periodicals, and other mail matter. Later, a substitute is drafted to clear up this wreckage, and patrons are surprised to get three or four missing issues of their daily paper on one delivery. Still another carrier, nervously anxious to escape official reprimand, resorts to all sorts of questionable expedients to dispose of his mail, to later answer more serious complaint.

Meanwhile a heavy day comes along and a large volume of mail arrives at the office. The working force is swamped; mail piles up, and for the purpose of getting out the most important, first-class mail is given the preference, while other classes being switched from pillar to post, instead of being handled once, are pawed over five or six times. More substitutes are requisitioned and assigned to strange territory, adding to the confusion. One delivery in residence sections becomes the regular order, and outbound mail lies over in street letter boxes for 24 hours before being collected.

That this picture is not overdrawn can be readily confirmed by a talk with postal employees or by a careful analysis of the figures furnished by the department itself. Take the case of the substitute, for instance: This year an appropriation to cover this item calls for $4,100,000, a jump of more than $2,000,000 within the past few years. Deduct from this estimate $1,352,864 for pay of substitutes working in place of 34,592 carriers off on vacation and there is left $2,747,136 to be expended for auxiliary and temporary hire of substitute carriers. Why this immense sum? It means that aside from vacation periods the average carrier must be helped out by a substitute to the extent of 27 days during the year, and this makes no allowance for an ever-increasing item of overtime the regular carrier is compelled to work.

From 1909 to 1915 there were 59 carriers reduced to the substitute list, while in 1915, 1916, 1917, at a time when postal revenues were increasing by leaps and bounds, 729 carriers were thus reduced. Why is it that the carrier force was only increased 1.4 per cent last year, while postal revenues increased 5.66 per cent? The postal receipts of 1917 amounted to $42,477,951 more in 1917 than in 1915, yet the cost of City Delivery Service was exactly $4,773.96 more in 1917 than in 1915. Imagine a concern doing an increased business of $42,000,000 on an increased overhead of $4,000.

NO WONDER THE SERVICE IS DEMORALIZED.

Unsatisfactory as has been the handling of first-class mail it has been infinitely better than the service given other classes, which has been miserable beyond reckoning, and which mail has been allowed to accumulate in terminals and in post offices to an amazing degree. A million dollars' worth of registered matter, a short time ago, was lost for 14 days in such an accumulation in New York City before being discovered. The postmaster in Washington, during the month of January this year, while denying the charge that mail was being held up for a period of three weeks, admitted to a congestion 24 hours behind schedule. Conditions pictured as existed in the Chelsea Terminal of the New York office have been little less than frightful. Here is an extract from the Manufacturers' Record, which I will insert, showing where daily papers regularly arrived three and four issues at one delivery:

WOULD BE WELCOMED—THE COUNTRY HAS NO OBJECTION TO SECRETARY BURLESON RESIGNING.

A dispatch from Washington says that Postmaster General Burleson is seriously considering retirement from the Cabinet in order to enter the race in Texas for the United States Senate, and it adds, "Burleson is known to be thoroughly tired of department service."

It is to be hoped that these statements are correct, for Mr. Burleson is certainly no more "tired of departmental service" than the country is tired of the kind of departmental service which it has been receiving from the post office since long before our entrance into the war.

Typical of these conditions are the receipt by the writer in Daytona, Fla., on Saturday, of the Baltimore papers issued in Baltimore on the preceding Monday, and sometimes the delay is even greater. Boston papers have been exactly one week in coming from the Hub of New England. As there is no such delay in the trains coming South it is very evident that the difficulty is in the post office. Take, for instance, the Baltimore morning papers, sent out of that city somewhere between midnight and 3 o'clock Monday morning, and remember that they reach Daytona late Saturday afternoon. Some days three or four issues of the same paper, but of different dates, are received by the writer in the same mail. This condition, which goes on from day to day, is typical of post-office service. There is often a difference of as much as 24 hours in the receipt of two copies of the Manufacturers' Record, for instance, mailed in Baltimore at exactly the same time.

We sincerely trust that the rumor sent out from Washington, that Postmaster Burleson is considering retirement, is correct, and that he will not only consider it, but will act favorably upon the matter.

Here is an unintended, and for that reason more severe, indictment of the present Postal Service contained in a letter from Theodore Hewes, of Indianapolis, Ind., addressed to dog fanciers, which begins as follows:

For once in the history of our country we find it next to impossible to get second or third class mail delivered with any degree of accuracy.

This writer evidently has so lost confidence in the Postal Service that, although having a month to spare, will not trust his communications to second or third class mail, but sends them first class instead.

DOG FANCIERS, THIS IS A PERSONAL LETTER TO YOU.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., February 2, 1918.

For once in the history of our country we find it next to impossible to get second or third class mail delivered with any degree of accuracy. Many of the dog shows have been seriously crippled this year for lack of entries, due, in the majority of cases, to the delay in receiving premium lists. For that reason the premium lists and entry blanks of the Indianapolis Kennel Club are mailed to you under first-class postage.

The dog shows of this country never were up against such trying conditions as they are to-day, and show managers that have the courage to go ahead in the face of present conditions are certainly entitled to your most liberal patronage. The snow blockade, we can reasonably figure, will be out of the way by March 1, so that need not delay your entries. But there are other matters that only the experienced show managers take into account, i. e., the question of expressing shipments. You have been having trouble in getting your shipments accepted, and are likely to have trouble unless you take the matter up with your local agent in advance, and it is this matter that has called forth this letter. I have arranged with the express companies in Indianapolis to furnish sufficient room for all dogs shipped, even though they may arrive two days in advance of the show. And owners or handlers may have the privilege of going to the storehouse and taking their dogs out for exercise. I have also arranged with the Denison Hotel (the headquarters of the dog exhibitors in this city) to allow toy dogs to be brought to the hotel in advance of the show, provided the owners are with them.

FANCIERS, IT IS UP TO YOU.

We have done our bit. Will you do yours? You owe it to yourself, you owe it to the fancy, and, above all else, you owe it to your country to see to it that the Indianapolis show, March 1, 2, and 3, is up to standard. And let us show to the world that, regardless of war, we are doing our bit to keep the industry up to the highest standard.

Now, then, do this much for me: Make the largest entry you have ever made at any show. Come with your exhibit if possible. Talk dogs, preach dogs, and in the right way get others interested in the breeding and exhibiting of dogs.

If your local express agent has any hesitancy in accepting your dogs for shipment, make it a point to leave one or two days ahead of time and show him this letter as proof that we will take care of them on arrival.

Yours, for the best dog show ever caged in the Middle West,

THEO. HEWES.

Similar cases could be submitted in convincing number and these would not represent the smallest fraction of the inefficiency that permeates the service, because the delays, omissions, and mishandling of mails are a sort of an intangible thing. Everybody feels it; everybody experiences it, yet to secure specific and definite evidence of the excessive time consumed in the interval between depositing a letter in a street letter box and the hour of its delivery at its destination involves so much trouble that few people are willing to assume the rather thankless task. This is what the Broadway Association of New York did last year, and their findings confirmed not only the prevailing opinion of poor service and unexplainable irregularity of delivery but they also showed that in some instances from 24 to 36 hours was used in local deliveries just a few blocks from the point of mailing.

It was possible a few years ago to examine the two postmarks on a letter and ascertain the time a letter was received in the office of mailing and the time it reached the office of its destination, and thus estimate the intervening time consumed in transit. This is no longer possible, because on the plea of economy the practice of postmarking a letter at the office of its destination has been discontinued, and consequently the letter may be held up indefinitely en route and the patron has no check to indicate the point of delay. It is even stated with good authority that the postmark hour at the office of mailing now means little or nothing, because a speeded-up office force have no time to change the postmark at hourly intervals and one impress sometimes serves for 12 hours.

THE SYSTEM AND THE PATRON.

The most grevious sufferer under this efficiency system is the post-office patron. With rearrangement of routes followed by belated or discontinued deliveries, he finds that where formerly his mail reached him about 8 o'clock in the morning he now receives it at 10. Redistricting often puts his place of business at the end of the carrier's newly enlarged route, and then it becomes a matter of grave uncertainty when his mail will arrive. Regularity of schedule has vanished, his day's work has been upset, and his time has been lost along with his temper. Due to this delay, consignments of merchandise may await dispatch for an additional day; financial deals are held up; appointments are ofttimes broken; and a variety of business activities must mark time, waiting on the mail. Under the fair name of efficiency and for the purpose of saving the salary paid a $3-a-day employee, this mischievous and perverted administrative method stumbles on its broken way, leaving a trail of dislocated business connections and discontented people to mark its progress.

THE STANDARD GAIT.

But there is still another angle to this efficiency system. Formerly the carrier was assigned a route, which was by and large considered a fair day's work, taking one day with another. If he moved briskly and energetically, it often happened that he could complete his tour of duty within the full eight-hour day. This fact largely explains why the average time recorded among a group of carriers would be 7 hours and 35 minutes—a condition which so notably attracted the attention of the efficiency experts. Working under the new efficiency system, the carrier discovered that no matter how he might hurry there was always more work piled up before him, and if he was not called on to work overtime he at least must stay the full eight hours. Naturally, in view of the excellent examples offered by those in authority, it would be surprising, indeed, if he did not do a little standardizing on his own account and adopt a standard gait.

Men thus situated, given least to worry, go about their work in a machine-like methodical fashion, deaf to complaint or criticism, losing the pride of performance and trudging along in sullen resentment against a system that stifles initiative and sentences the intelligent toiler to be a numbered cog in a scientifically adjusted machine. Carriers of more nervous temperament worry under the strain, the constant nagging and driving, resulting finally in illness or disability. Statistics of letter carriers' sick-benefit associations show by the physician's statement that 60 per cent of illness in the ranks is due to "overwork and worry."

THE SYSTEM AND EMPLOYEES' HEALTH.

Such statements find confirmation in a table taken from the Bulletin of August, 1917, issued by the Department of Labor, and which I will insert, showing that in a compilation of sick-benefit statistics, taken from benefits paid to 16 large craft organizations, the letter carrier stands at the very head in the enumeration of hazardous occupations. This, too, despite the prevailing belief that the letter carrier has a healthy job.

Statistics compiled by the National Sick Benefit Association, with a membership numbering some 15,000 letter carriers, shows that one letter carrier in less than every seven is disabled, through illness or accident, in excess of five weeks during the year. The following table, which I will insert, compiled by the same association, shows that disability through illness or accident has increased 38 per cent since this speed-up efficiency system has been installed:

Nature and extent of disability benefits paid, average membership, frequency and duration of disabilities, and per capita cost of cash benefits, 16 national or international trade-unions.

THE SYSTEM AND ITS ACTUAL COST.

Not alone, however, has this system of scientific efficiency demoralized the Postal Service, disrupted an efficient organization, shaken the people's confidence in one of their own institutions, and lowered the health and morale of postal employees, but it has also proved itself to be one of the most wastefully extravagant experiments ever conducted by a considerable business enterprise in the country.

Of course, a financial exhibit of postal expenditures may show that a million or two dollars have been apparently saved through its application in the City Delivery Division alone, but this exhibit by no means tells the whole story.

Is it worth anything to have a contented and responsive working force?

Is it worth anything to maintain in high vigor the health and vitality of an army of postal employees?

Is it worth anything to hold the confidence of the people in one of their own institutions?

Is it worth anything to surround men with an environment that stimulates individual initiative and promotes intellectual development? Such things can not be measured by dollars nor can they be translated into mere bookkeeping entries. This recapitulation is enough to everlastingly condemn the system, but let us judge it from a purely material standpoint and we will find that, financially speaking, it has failed hopelessly.

THE PROFIT TEST.

For every dollar the system claims to have saved in reducing postal expenses—business owned by the people, let us not forget—it has cost the people a hundred dollars in some other way. Let us center our gaze on the system in operation. The working force is reduced one carrier and eight hours' work, meaning $3 is thus presumably saved. In consequence the service is thrown out of gear, deliveries fail, and the thousand and one things flowing from a dislocated service happen.

Hundreds of people consume accumulated minutes waiting for their mail; business deals are held up; appointments are interrupted; shipments are delayed, and one loss after another falls upon the patron and those awaiting his orders, which, if it were possible to total in dollars, would make comparison with the amount alleged to be saved that would be unspeakably absurd. As an example of how the system works, I ask you to look in some day at the stamp window of any of the post-office stations in this city, where the same post-office clerk weighs and names the rate on parcel-post packages and has charge of stamp sales. Instead of employing an additional clerk, one man looks after all this work, with the result that the finances of the Post Office Department show $3 saved and fully 500 people lose each from 5 to 15 minutes waiting on service. Were the people familiar with the multitude of injuries they have suffered through having the commendable purpose of efficiency twisted and perverted out of all shape or meaning by a squad of egotistical, tinkering experimenters, inspired by an utterly selfish motive, they would make short shrift of them and in less time than it takes me to explain the workings of their so-called efficiency system.

The system is a hopeless financial failure, just as it is in every other way. Nothing good can be said in its defense. It is philosophically unsound and it is based on an utter misconception of the proper relations of the Post Office to the people and the worker to his work. It must go. May an aroused public indignation force a little common sense and sanity into the understanding of the Postmaster General and his staff and cause them to abandon a policy founded on fallacy and altogether costly and dangerous in its execution. In its stead give the people a sound business administration of the Postal Service, based upon a wise policy sensibly followed.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have claimed the indulgence of the House for the purpose of making a correction of the RECORD, which does an injustice to a very capable and a very faithful employee of the Senate and House and also to members of the Capitol police force. During the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill a colloquy occurred between the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] and myself in regard to the Capitol police, and I shall read a portion of that colloquy:

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman tell the House on whose recommendation the 100 policemen are appointed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know.

Mr. SANFORD. If the gentleman will look into it, he will find we have got about 30 policemen out of the 100.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that none of them were appointed on my recommendation.

Mr. SANFORD. The chief tells us that he can use about 30 out of the hundred.

Now, of course, we all know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], whom we all esteem and respect as one of the most capable, the most earnest, and most faithful Representatives upon the floor of this Chamber, would not intentionally do anyone an injustice, and I may say personally I have a very warm regard for him. But the statement as made does an unintentional injustice to the captain of the Capitol police, Mr. M. B. Louthan, and I wish to read to the committee a statement which has been furnished me, showing the facts in reference to the employment and assignment of the Capitol police. He says:

In reply to statement made on floor of the House by Representative SANFORD March 14 wherein he claims there are 100 policemen on roll and that the chief had told him there were only 30 working at one time, and wanted to know where the other 70 were.

The facts are there are 97 policemen; 16 of these are in House Office Building and not under the supervision of the police captain. In the department under Capt. Louthan there are 81 men. This includes the Capitol and grounds and Senate Office Building. They are divided into three shifts, working as follows: Shift No. 1 from 8 a. m. to 4 p. m., shift No. 2 from 4 p. m. to 12 midnight, shift No. 3 from 12 midnight to 8 a. m., as per report attached, showing the distribution of men on February 13, showing where every man of the entire 81 is located and the hours he works.

There could be no grounds for the statement made by Representative SANFORD, and the chief claims he never told him he was only using 30 men, but did tell him he was using every one of the 81 men every day, as the reports of the three lieutenants attached will show.

By observing the attached sheets you will see that many posts where policemen are needed are vacant on account of having no men to place there.

These men work every day in the year, Sunday included, and are given 50 days leave every year, this because they work Sundays. The three sheets show 77 men at work, and the 4 officers make 81 total men in the department.

Now, I hold in my hand the sheets or lists referred to showing just where the various 77 policemen are stationed, and this statement also shows a number of places where it is considered essential that policemen should be assigned, but can not be assigned because they have not a sufficient number. These lists are entirely too lengthy, and I consider it unnecessary to insert them in the RECORD.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before I yield the floor I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to refer in a very brief manner to the splendid record which has been made by every county of the sixth congressional district of Tennessee which I have the honor to represent in its subscriptions to the third liberty loan and also in subscriptions made to previous liberty loans and other war activities. It is a record which is characteristic of those liberty loving and patriotic people, for they have never failed to respond to an appeal of their Government.

The afternoon paper tells us that up to the present time, with nearly a week to go so far as the campaign is concerned, there have been 12,000,000 subscribers, which are already 3,000,000 more than subscribed to the second liberty loan. This indicates that the subscriptions to this loan are being taken largely by people of moderate means rather than by the wealthier classes and that is a very gratifying fact to all of us, for it shows that the people of this country, with practical unanimity, are responding to their duty and to their obligations to make necessary sacrifices and do their bit here in order to sustain our soldiers who are being sent over to fight our battles for us. I have only general information as to what has been subscribed and contributed by all the counties in my district save one, but I know that there has been no lack of patriotism in any of them. Recently the Rotary Club of the city of Nashville, which like the rotary clubs of all other cities is composed of some of the most patriotic, prominent, and most enterprising and forward-looking young business men of the city, collected information as to some of the things the citizenship of Nashville has done to aid the Government since the beginning of the war, and this club has sent this information out to all other cities of similar size in the United States and in Canada with a challenge to those cities to show whether or not they hold a record equal to that made by Nashville. This record shows:

In the first liberty loan Nashville was allotted $3,120,429.58, and Nashville subscribed $4,381,650.

In the second liberty loan Nashville was allotted $4,511,420.96, and Nashville subscribed $6,642,600.

In the third liberty loan Nashville was allotted $4,800,000, and although this liberty-loan campaign does not close until May 4, Nashville has already subscribed over $5,000,000.

In the Red Cross drive Nashville was allotted $150,000, and subscribed $185,000, of which over 97 per cent has been paid.

In the Army Y. M. C. A. campaign Nashville was asked for $40,000, and agreed at the beginning of the campaign to raise $75,000, and actually subscribed $94,000.

In the campaign for "Eyes for the Navy," Nashville furnished more than 500 pairs of glasses.

In the campaign for books for our soldiers Nashville furnished 47,518 volumes.

In the campaign for clothes for the relief of Belgium, Nashville was asked for a carload, and furnished one and a half carloads, estimated second-hand value over $50,000.

Nashville was asked for $8,000 for Y. W. C. A. rest-room buildings at different cantonments. Nashville gave $13,500.

More than 50 representative business men of Nashville are now in the religious and army work of the Y. M. C. A.

Nashville furnished one complete medical unit, composed of 12 leading physicians, 21 nurses, and 45 enlisted men, who are now in France.

Nashville is one of only nine cities in the United States showing improvement in condition of their boys since the war began, as reported by executive secretary of Boys' Club Federation of America.

Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that the outstanding feature of the splendid record which has been made by the citizenship of Nashville is contained in the fact that there is an improved showing, physical, mental, and moral, among its boys. From some of the belligerent countries there comes a saddening story of the devastating effect war conditions have had on the rising generations of these countries, as shown in increased delinquency and tendency to mental and moral deterioration. Happily the communities of our own beloved land have so far counteracted any such blighting influence, and not only have maintained the high record which had been reached in times of peace, but have actually improved conditions in this respect. I am proud to say that Nashville stands among the five foremost cities who have shown the greatest improvement in this regard. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply thankful and justly proud that Nashville gives a shining example in this galaxy of communities who have preserved the most precious possession of a Christian State, the budding promise of an upright, intelligent, patriotic, and God-serving citizenship. It appears to be, unhappily, an impression with some that the price of this stupendous struggle for the maintenance of the integrity of democratic States includes a certain deterioration of the moral standard of a portion of the rising generation. I am thankful, Mr. Chairman, that this theory is in error, and can not too strongly emphasize this fact, and take particular pleasure in placing the example of the citizens of Nashville and that of other cities in America before this honorable body. It is written in the fates that we will win, for right must triumph over might, as light dispels darkness; but the price will be too heavy if it carries with it the penalty of blighting the coming generation with the loss of ideal and the solid characteristics of honest worth and moral uprightness. It is not true, Mr. Chairman, that we can not win and at the same time raise even higher the standard of our rising citizenship, and I am gratified to be able to submit the proof that this result can be attained as a matter of permanent record. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. MAPES. In regard to the colloquy which the gentleman had with Representative SANFORD, of New York, about the number of police that the chief said he could make use of, did the statement which the gentleman read here come from the chief or some other officer?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It came from Capt. Louthan, at the head of the Capitol police here, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. Did the gentleman consult the chief to ascertain just what the chief did say?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, my information is that the chief states that he did have a conversation with our friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], but there has evidently been a misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman from New York. The chief was evidently speaking to the gentleman with refcrence to the number of men on each of the shifts, whereas the gentleman from New York evidently assumed he was referring——

Mr. MAPES. But did the gentleman from Tennessee consult with the chief?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I did not personally see the chief.

Mr. MAPES. So that the gentleman can not give the chief's own interpretation of the conversation to which the gentleman from New York referred?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; but I feel sure from what has been told me that the chief was referring to men on each of the three shifts, whereas the gentleman from New York evidently had in mind the entire force.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the cables bring the news that the Socialists of Austria-Hungary have been organizing for to-day, the 1st of May, nation-wide demonstrations in favor of universal peace, of a peace without conquest and without annexations.

That the Austrian people are weary of this war is apparent to the most superficial observer. It is only the physical coercion, exercised by the overweening German junkerism, that keeps Austria in the fight. While the so-called peace with Russia, and particularly with Ukraine, is defended as a "bread peace," a sort of a truce to obtain the much-needed bread, the Austrian people realize that further subjection to Prussian domination involves a renewal of the struggle with Russia, and that only by universal peace, based upon the right of each nation to live an unmolested life, could a genuine peace be secured. From her internal experience Austria knows well that there is nothing more unstable than a peace based upon the oppression of one people by another.

The Socialists of Austro-Hungary are organizing peace demonstrations. We shall later know to what extent such demonstrations are taking place in Germany where international socialism has been steadily gaining ground at the expense of the so-called social patriots or Government Socialists.

You will recall that the 1st of May has in recent times, even before the war, been awaited in all countries and particularly in monarchical countries as the culminating day for manifestations of unrest. It carried an ominous threat to monarchical institutions on the Continent of Europe.

The 1st of May has special significance for the socialists. Some 25 years before the declaration of war, at an international Socialist congress, where representatives of the socialists of the world were assembled, the resolution was reached that the 1st of May should be celebrated as an international holiday by the Socialists and by labor throughout all countries. It was the first time in the history of the world that such a holiday was established. Men of all religions, of all nations, of all races were to unite on that day in demonstrations of the growing sentiment of international solidarity. They were everywhere to emphasize the ideals of universal peace and to seek everywhere better conditions and a larger measure of political and industrial liberty for the masses. They were everywhere to attempt to reduce to practice that noble ethical conception, recognized by all religious systems, that mankind is one family, and that all men are brothers. The day was to be consecrated to the religion of humanity.

It was not by any means an easy thing to carry out the resolution. The Governments of Germany, Austria, and Russia particularly looked upon these demonstrations as a foreboding of their downfall. Many a 1st of May demonstration ended in bloodshed. It met with as little favor with the Governments as with employers. When the 1st of May fell on a week day the Socialists were compelled in most places to organize their demonstrations in the evening. In one of the prisons of Siberia where a number of revolutionists were confined, they found no other way of celebrating the 1st of May than by burning their shirts. The Socialists adopted the French Marseillaise as their international hymn.

It is this emphasis of international solidarity by the socialists of the world that has given rise to the accusation made usually by the uninformed, or by those who know better but who are interested in suppressing the truth, that socialism is antinational. Nothing is further from the truth. Internationalism necessarily means cooperation among nations. It presupposes the existence of nations. It presupposes the right of a group of mankind, with a distinct language or a distinct culture, to exist alongside with similar groups. All that internationalism means is that a code of international right shall prevail in the relations of nations. The socialist code repudiates the rule of physical supremacy among nations. The socialists would have every nation constitute a member of a well-ordered international family, and would repudiate the rule of physical force in the relations among nations as civilized societies have learned to repudiate it in the relations among individual members of a community.

I have on numerous previous occasions called your attention to the magnificent efforts made by the socialists of the world to oppose militarism, to combat imperialism, and to contend against colonial acquisitions. In a pamphlet called The Policy of the International—it can be obtained in the Congressional Library—you will find a detailed recital of the efforts made by the socialists of Europe to prevent the Balkan wars from extending to the rest of Europe, as well as of the steps taken by the International Socialist Bureau and by the European socialists to prevent the present war.

Up to the very last minute there were mass demonstrations against war in Germany. The pamphlet contains a speech of and an interview with Camille Huysmans, the secretary of the International Socialist Bureau and a member of the Belgian Parliament and of the Brussel's City Council.

In speaking of a meeting held by the executive committee of the International Socialist Bureau on July 29, five days before the outbreak of the war, Huysmans said:

> At that meeting it was agreed to strengthen again the action against war and to support the proposition that the Austro-Serbian dispute should be submitted to arbitration. The German and French members went home with the mission, on the one hand, to insist at Berlin that the Austrian Government should be reasonable in its demands, and, on the other hand, to insist at Paris that Russia should not take part in the conflict. The English and Italian sections had authority to do all that they could at London and Rome to support this pacific action.

When the war broke out the socialists were staggered. They were nowhere numerically strong enough to prevent it. The duty of the French and Belgian socialists was clear. Their countries had been invaded; the existence of their peoples was jeopardized, and they rushed to the defense of their countries as brave men were expected to do. In defending France the French socialist defended not only his own country but the cradle of civilization for Europe. There was no dissension among the French socialists, no difference of opinion. By all the precepts of the highest patriotism and of international socialism they were bound to give unstinted aid to protect France.

In Germany, in which the Government had been preparing for years for the contingency of a European war and where the ruling class, guided solely by strategic military considerations selected the most favorable moment for the conflict, the socialists found themselves in an impossible position. In 24 hours the Government could have crushed every socialist organization in the country. But that was not all. While republican France and innocent little Belgium were to the west of them, what was then considered a powerful military force—Russia—threatened Germany from the east. The war was on. The question that presented itself to the socialists was whether they should vote for the military budget. The individual socialist was already in the ranks, a part of a military machine. The parliamentary group, consisting of 110 members out of 397, were divided on the question of voting military credits. By a caucus rule they decided to vote for the war budget. The chairman of the Socialist Executive Committee of Germany, Haase, was in the minority in the caucus. Since then the best intellectual forces of the German social democracy have refused to vote military credits and have fearlessly denounced the imperialistic policies of the Government. What was in the beginning of the war a minority seems to represent now a formidable power in the socialist movement of Germany.

It was Haase who mercilously flayed the Government for the so-called Russian peace and who exposed the annexationist designs of the German Government.

The Socialists of the world, who for more than 50 years advocated international cooperation, were compelled by the very force of events to defend their respective countries.

They have not, however, abandoned the desire to tie together the severed bonds of internationalism.

The average conception of patriotism is that a man must always insist that his country is right, and as the Austrian Socialist Adler recently said on the floor of the Reichsrath it seems to be "considered a patriotic duty to lie for the Fatherland."

It was a difficult task that devolved upon the Socialists. No one can afford to weaken his country when its very existence may depend upon the success or defeat of its arms. To oppose the country entering a war is one thing; to oppose the country after it has been put in danger by entering a war is a responsibility that no one can honestly assume. The German Government has been contending that Germany is in danger of being dismembered, that it is threatened with annihilation, that it is fighting a war of defense.

The test of its sincerity came with the Russian revolution. An incompetent, inefficient, dishonest, antinational and antisocial autocratic Government was overthrown by the Russian people. The Revolutionary Government renounced all claims upon the territory of other nations. Although access to Constantinople was a vital need for Russia, and the dream of her statesmen for centuries, the new democracy did not hesitate to bring conclusive evidence of its good faith by repudiating all designs upon Constantinople. An internal revolution in war time does not add to the strength of a belligerent. Even the allies of Russia failed to understand the import of the revolution. The Socialists saw the full significance of it, and a movement for an international Socialist congress, which would have enabled the Socialists of the allied countries to put to the test the internationalism of the German social democracy, gained momentum.

Unfortunately the allied Governments prevented the assembling of such a congress. As I said on a previous occasion, "It was a blunder for which the full price has not yet been paid."

But while the allies blundered and the Socialists were prevented from coming together, the Imperial German Government took full advantage of the confusion and helplessness of the Russian people who were in the throes of war and revolution.

The German Government has now assumed the part heretofore played by czarism. Theretofore Russia was the gendarme of Europe; now the German imperialistic Government has become the executioner of Europe.

It has forced a so-called peace upon Russia. It has deprived her of her best Provinces. It has torn away from her Ukraine, the granary of Russia and Europe. It is to the credit of the German Socialists that they did not vote for the ratification of that infamous treaty.

The German Government is defying the world. Its only hope of survival is the old-fashioned kind of patriotism which sanctions every crime against every other nation, so long as one's own nation is aggrandized. The German Imperial Government hopes to continue to live, if it can bring as a compensation for all the sacrifices and as a result of all its crimes new territory, new frontiers, additional industrial opportunities, new domains.

Like the Government of the Czar, it is antisocial, antinational, and against the world.

Will the socialists of Germany be able to gather enough strength to overcome that kind of loyalty and that kind of patriotism? Are they prepared to uphold their Government in a career which will make the division of the world into Germans and anti-Germans permanent?

The Interallied Socialist Conference, held in London, England, in February of this year, has renewed the request for an international socialist congress. The allied Socialists are determined, however, that a conference of all the socialists, including those of the central powers, would be of value only then, when all the organizations which are to be represented should pledge themselves in advance of the conference to the principle "no annexations, no punitive indemnities, and the right of all peoples to self-determination," and further, to quote the inter-allied conference report, "that they are working with all their power to obtain from their Governments the necessary guaranties to apply these principles honestly and unreservedly to all questions to be dealt with at any official peace conference."

It is to be hoped that the Governments responsible for the conduct of the war will see the wisdom of permitting such an international conference.

On a previous occasion I obtained leave to incorporate in the RECORD the memorandum on war aims agreed upon at the Interallied Socialist Congress. There were present at the conference representatives from England, Belgium, Roumania, France, Italy, Serbia, and Greece. Messages were received from the socialists of South Africa, Portugal, the socialist revolutionists of Russia, and the Menshevic section of the Russian Social Democratic Party indorsing the war aims of the conference, the substance of which had been made public two months before.

I consider this document one of the most valuable documents in the history of the war. The worker, the man at the lowest rung of the social ladder, he upon whom press all the burdens of society, has asserted himself and has voiced his wishes and his claims as an international force, speaking in terms of the universal, representative of a true international faith, defending his country against aggression but presenting to the world a basis of an understanding and cooperation among nations.

I am particularly interested in giving this document the greatest publicity, as it is my hope that the socialist movement in the United States will unanimously indorse and stand by the decision of the Inter-Allied Socialist Congress. As socialists, whatever our opinions might have been about the entry of the United States into the war, we certainly can not afford to see the United States worsted in the contest. The socialist is not called upon to betray his faith in international socialism nor in the necessity of substituting the now prevailing rule of physical force by an international code of right.

It is not that the allied countries are without their dark forces. There are imperialists everywhere. There are everywhere men who would wrap up their sinister designs in the folds of a national flag and would have whole peoples sacrificed in pursuance of schemes of economic aggrandizement.

These facts, however, are clear: An arrogant and willful military force threatens to crush the world. Had we not been participants in the war both our sympathies and interests as liberty-loving men would have been with France and Belgium and England and unfortunate Russia, as against German imperialism. But the United States is in the war. Whatever the designs or the dreams of capitalistic imperialists may be, the President of the United States has left no doubt that the American people, and he as their spokesman, have no selfish designs. The President has not only adopted the substance of the international Socialist program, but even the very formula of the international Socialist movement for his expression of the aims and objects of the United States in this war.

The Socialists in the United States can not be indifferent or neutral. There is surely no Socialist here who would like to see the United States defeated. In the absence of selfish national designs by the United States against any of the peoples of Europe American participation of the United States in the world contest will insure the presence of an element of moderation at the international peace conference.

The declaration of the Inter-Allied Socialist conference rises to the noblest heights of Socialist ethics. It is free from malice and hatred. There is no jingoism about it. The philosophy of the international Socialist movement which has been striving for more than half a century to curb imperialism, to eliminate national antipathies, to do away with clandestine diplomacy, with secret treaties, to remove force as a means of settling national differences, and to bring order into the relations of peoples, finds there its noblest expression.

The work of the conference is inspired, not by a desire to restore the old, which carried within it the germs of the present conflict, but to build anew.

The war aims of interallied labor lay special stress on the need of establishing a league of nations for the defense of international right. They would do away with professional armies. They emphatically oppose all projects for an economic war after peace has been secured.

They propose a comprehensive, constructive program for the solution of the problems which will arise with peace. They would provide for the restoration of the devastated areas and for the reparation of the wrongdoing not only by restoring "material property proved to be destroyed or damaged but by setting up the wage earners and peasants themselves in homes and employments."

While proposing solutions for the particular problems of (a) Belgium, (b) Alsace-Lorraine, (c) the Balkans, (d) Italy, (e) Poland and the Baltic Provinces, (f) the Jews and Palestine, (g) the Turkish Empire, (h) Austria-Hungary, (i) the colonies and dependencies, the main concern of the conference is that a supernational authority, guided by international principles of right, shall be the determining factor in solving each individual problem as it presents itself.

Under leave heretofore granted to me I incorporate the full text of the "Memorandum on War Aims."

INTER-ALLIED LABOR WAR AIMS.

The following is the full text of the Memorandum on War Aims adopted by the Inter-Allied Labor and Socialist Conference in London:

THE WAR.

I. The Inter-Allied Conference declares that whatever may have been the causes of the outbreak of war, it is clear that the peoples of Europe, who are necessarily the chief sufferers from its horrors, had themselves no hand in it. Their common interest is now so to conduct the terrible struggle in which they find themselves engaged as to bring it, as soon as may be possible, to an issue in a secure and lasting peace for the world.

The conference sees no reason to depart from the following declaration unanimously agreed to at the Conference of the Socialist and Labor Parties of the Allied Nations on February 14, 1915:

"This conference can not ignore the profound general causes of the European conflict, itself a monstrous product of the antagonisms which tear asunder capitalist society and of the policy of colonial dependencies and aggressive imperialism, against which international socialism has never ceased to fight, and in which every government has its share of responsibility.

"The invasion of Belgium and France by the German armies threatens the very existence of independent nationalities and strikes a blow at all faith in treaties. In these circumstances a victory for German imperialism would be the defeat and the destruction of democracy and liberty in Europe. The Socialists of Great Britain, Belgium, France, and Russia do not pursue the political and economic crushing of Germany; they are not at war with the peoples of Germany and Austria, but only with the Governments of those countries, by which they are oppressed. They demand that Belgium shall be liberated and compensated. They desire that the question of Poland shall be settled in accordance with the wishes of the Polish people, either in the sense of autonomy in the midst of another State, or in that of complete independence. They wish that throughout all Europe, from Alsace-Lorraine to the Balkans, those populations that have been annexed by force shall receive the right freely to dispose of themselves.

"While inflexibly resolved to fight until victory is achieved to accomplish this task of liberation, the socialists are none the less resolved to resist any attempt to transform this defensive war into a war of conquest, which would only prepare fresh conflicts, create new grievances, and subject various peoples more than ever to the double plague of armaments and war.

"Satisfied that they are remaining true to the principles of the international, the members of the conference express the hope that the working classes of all the different countries will before long find themselves united again in their struggle against militarism and capitalist imperialism. The victory of the allied powers must be a victory for popular liberty, for unity, independence, and autonomy of the nations in the peaceful federation of the united States of Europe and the world."

MAKING THE WORLD SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY.

II. Whatever may have been the objects for which the war was begun, the fundamental purpose of the interallied conference in supporting the continuance of the struggle is that the world may henceforth be made safe for democracy.

Of all the conditions of peace none is so important to the peoples of the world as that there should be henceforth on earth no more war.

Whoever triumphs, the peoples will have lost unless an international system is established which will prevent war. What would it mean to declare the right of peoples to self-determination if this right were left at the mercy of new violations and was not protected by a supernational authority? That authority can be no other than the league of nations, in which not only all the present belligerents but every other independent State should be pressed to join.

The constitution of such a league of nations implies the immediate establishment of an international high court, not only for the settlement of all disputes between States that are of justiciable nature but also for prompt and effective mediation between States in other issues that vitally interest the power or honor of such States. It is also under the control of the league of nations that the consultation of peoples for purposes of self-determination must be organized. This popular right can be vindicated only by popular vote. The league of nations shall establish the procedure of international jurisdiction, fix the methods which will maintain the freedom and security of the election, restore the political rights of individuals which violence and conquest may have injured, repress any attempt to use pressure or corruption, and prevent any subsequent reprisals. It will be also necessary to form an international legislature, in which the representatives of every civilized State would have their allotted share and energetically to push forward, step by step, the development of international legislation agreed to by, and definitely binding upon, the several States.

By a solemn agreement all the States and peoples consulted shall pledge themselves to submit every issue between two or more of them for settlement as aforesaid. Refusal to accept arbitration or to submit to the settlement will imply deliberate aggression, and all the nations will necessarily have to make common cause, by using any and every means at their disposal, either economical or military, against any State or States refusing to submit to the arbitration award, or attempting to break the world's covenant of peace.

But the sincere acceptance of the rules and decisions of the supernational authority implies complete democratization in all countries: the removal of all the arbitrary powers who, until now, have assumed the right of choosing between peace and war; the maintenance or creation of legislatures elected by and on behalf of the sovereign right of the people; the suppression of secret diplomacy, to be replaced by the conduct of foreign policy under the control of popular legislatures, and the publication of all treaties, which must never be in contravention of the stipulation of the league of nations, with the absolute responsibility of the Government, and more particularly of the foreign minister, of each country to its legislature.

Only such a policy will enforce the frank abandonment of every form of imperialism. When based on universal democracy, in a world in which effective international guaranties against aggression have been secured, the league of nations will achieve the complete suppression of force as the means of settling international differences.

The league of nations, in order to prepare for the concerted abolition of compulsory military service in all countries, must first take steps for the prohibition of fresh armaments on land and sea and for the common limitation of the existing armaments by which all the peoples are burdened, as well as the control of war manufactures and the enforcement of such agreements as may be agreed to thereupon. The States must undertake such manufactures themselves, so as entirely to abolish profit-making armament firms, whose pecuniary interest lies always in the war scares and progressive competition in the preparation for war.

The nations, being armed solely for self-defense and for such action as the league of nations may ask them to take in defense of international right, will be left free, under international control either to create a voluntarily recruited force or to organize the nation for defense without professional armies for long terms of military service.

To give effect to the above principles, the Inter-Allied Conference declares that the rules upon which the league of nations will be founded must be included in the treaty of peace, and will henceforth become the basis of the settlement of differences. In that spirit the conference expresses its agreement with the propositions put forward by President Wilson in his last message:

(1) That each part of the final settlement must be based upon the essential justice of that particular case, and upon such adjustments as are most likely to bring a peace that will be permanent.

(2) That peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, even the great game now forever discredited of the balance of power; but that

(3) Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustments of compromise of claims amongst rival States.

(4) That all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe, and, consequently, of the world.

TERRITORIAL QUESTIONS.

III. The Inter-Allied Conference considers that the proclamation of principles of international law accepted by all nations, and the substitution of a regular procedure for the forceful acts by which States calling themselves sovereign have hitherto adjusted their differences—in short, the establishment of a league of nations—gives an entirely new aspect to territorial problems.

The old diplomacy and the yearnings after domination by States, or even by peoples, which during the whole of the nineteenth century have taken advantage of and corrupted the aspirations of nationalities, have brought Europe to a condition of anarchy and disorder which have led inevitably to the present catastrophe.

The conference declares it to be the duty of the labor and socialist movement to suppress without hesitation the imperialist designs in the various States which have led one government after another to seek, by the triumph of military force, to acquire either new territories or economic advantage.

The establishment of a system of international law and the guaranties afforded by a league of nations ought to remove the last excuse for those strategic protections which nations have hitherto felt bound to require.

It is the supreme principle of the right of each people to determine its own destiny that must now decide what steps should be taken by way of restitution or reparation, and whatever territorial readjustments may be found to be necessary at the close of the present war.

The conference accordingly emphasizes the importance to the labor and Socialist movement of a clear and exact definition of what is meant by the right of each people to determine its own destiny. Neither destiny of race nor identity of language can be regarded as affording more than a presumption in favor of federation or unification. During the nineteenth century the theories of this kind have so often served as a cloak for aggression that the international can not but seek to prevent any recurrence of such an evil. Any adjustments of boundaries that become necessary must be based exclusively upon the desire of the people concerned.

It is true that it is impossible for the necessary consultation of the desires of the people concerned to be made in any fixed and invariable way for all the cases in which it is required, and that the problems of nationality and territory are not the same for the inhabitants of all countries. Nevertheless, what is necessary in all cases is that the procedure to be adopted should be decided, not by one of the parties to the dispute, but by the supernational authority.

Upon the basis of the general principles herein formulated the conference proposes the following solutions of particular problems:

(A) BELGIUM.

The conference emphatically insists that a foremost condition of peace must be the reparation by the German Government, under the direction of an international commission, of the wrong admittedly done to Belgium; payment by that Government for all the damage that has resulted from this wrong; and the restoration of Belgium as an independent sovereign State, leaving to the decision of the Belgian people the determination of their own future policy in all respects.

(B) ALSACE AND LORRAINE.

The conference declares that the problem of Alsace and Lorraine is not one of territorial adjustment, but one of right, and thus an international problem, the solution of which is indispensable if peace is to be either just or lasting.

The treaty of Frankfort at one and the same time mutilated France and violated the right of the inhabitants of Alsace and Lorraine to dispose of their own destinies, a right which they have repeatedly claimed.

The new treaty of peace, in recognizing that Germany, by her declaration of war of 1914, has herself broken the treaty of Frankfort, will make null and void the gains of a brutal conquest and of the violence committed against the people.

France, having secured this recognition, can properly agree to a fresh consultation of the population of Alsace and Lorraine as to its own desires.

The treaty of peace will bear the signatures of every nation in the world. It will be guaranteed by the league of nations. To this league of nations France is prepared to remit, with the freedom and sincerity of a popular vote, of which the details can be subsequently settled, the organization of such a consultation as shall settle forever, as a matter of right, the future destiny of Alsace and Lorraine, and as shall finally remove from the common life of all Europe a quarrel which has imposed so heavy a burden upon it.

(C) THE BALKANS.

The conference lays down the principle that all the violations and perversions of the rights of the people which have taken place, or are still taking place, in the Balkans must be made the subject of redress or reparation.

Serbia, Montenegro, Roumania, Albania, and all the territories occupied by military forces should be evacuated by the hostile forces. Wherever any population of the same race and tongue demands to be united this must be done. Each such people must be accorded full liberty to settle its own destiny, without regard to the imperialistic pretensions of Austria, Hungary, Turkey, or other State.

Accepting this principle, the conference proposes that the whole problem of the administrative reorganization of the Balkan peoples should be dealt with by a special conference of their representatives, or in case of disagreement by an authoritative international commission on the basis of (a) the concession within each independent sovereignty of local autonomy and security for the development of its particular civilization of every racial minority; (b) the universal guarantee of freedom or religion and political equality for all races; (c) a customs and postal union embracing the whole of the Balkan States, with free access for each to its natural seaport; (d) the entry of all the Balkan States into a federation for the concerted arrangement by mutual agreement among themselves of all matters of common interest.

(D) ITALY.

The conference declares its warmest sympathy with the people of Italian blood and speech who have been left outside the boundaries that have, as a result of the diplomatic agreements of the past, and for strategic reasons, been assigned to the Kingdom of Italy, and supports their claim to be united with those of their own race and tongue. It realizes that arrangements may be necessary for securing the legitimate interests of the people of Italy in the adjacent seas, but it condemns the aims of conquest of Italian imperialism and believes that all legitimate needs can be safeguarded without precluding a like recognition of the deeds of others or annexation of other people's territories.

Regarding the Italian population dispersed on the eastern shores of the Adriatic, the relations between Italy and the Yugo-Slav populations must be based on principles of equity and conciliation, so as to prevent any cause of future quarrel.

If there are found to be groups of Slavonian race within the newly defined Kingdom of Italy, or groups of Italian race in Slavonian territory, mutual guarantees must be given for the assurance of all of them, on one side or the other, full liberty of local self-government and of the natural development of their several activities.

(E) POLAND AND THE BALTIC PROVINCES.

In accordance with the right of every people to determine its own destinies, Poland must be reconstituted in unity and independence with free access to the sea.

The conference declares further, that any annexation by Germany, whether open or disguised, of Livonia, Courland, or Lithuania would be a flagrant and wholly inadmissible violation of international law.

(F) THE JEWS AND PALESTINE.

The conference demands for the Jews in all countries the same elementary rights of freedom of religion, education, residence, and trade, and equal citizenship that ought to be extended to all the inhabitants of every nation. It further expresses the opinion that Palestine should be set free from the hard and oppressive Government of the Turk, in order that this country may form a free State under international guaranty, to which such of the Jewish people as desire to do so may return and may work out their own salvation free from interference by those of alien race or religion.

(G) THE PROBLEM OF THE TURKISH EMPIRE.

The conference condemns the handing back to the systematically cruel domination of the Turkish Government any subject people. Thus, whatever may be proposed with regard to Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Arabia they can not be restored to the tyranny of the Sultan and his Pashas. The conference condemns the imperialist aims of governments and capitalists who would make of these and other territories now dominated by the Turkish hordes merely instruments either of exploitation or militarism. If the peoples of these territories do not feel themselves able to settle their own destinies, the conference insists that, conformably with policy of "no annexations," they should be placed for administration in the hands of a commission acting under the supernational authority or league of nations. It is further suggested that the peace of the world requires that the Dardanelles should be permanently and effectively neutralized and opened like all the main lines of marine communication, under the control of the league of nations, freely to all nations, without hindrance or customs duties.

(H) AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The conference does not propose, as a war aim, dismemberment of Austria-Hungary or its deprivation of economic access to the sea. On the other hand, the conference can not admit that the claims to independence made by the Czecho-Slovaks and the Yugo-Slavs must be regarded merely as questions for internal decision. National independence ought to be accorded, according to rules to be laid down by the league of nations, to such peoples as demand it, and these communities ought to have the opportunity of determining their own groupings and federations according to their affinities and interests. If they think fit they are free to substitute a free federation of Danubian States for the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

(I) THE COLONIES AND DEPENDENCIES.

The international has always condemned the colonial policy of capitalist governments. Without ceasing to condemn it, the interallied conference nevertheless recognizes the existence of a state of things which it is obliged to take into account.

The conference considers that the treaty of peace ought to secure to the natives in all colonies and dependencies effective protection against the excesses of capitalist colonialism. The conference demands the concession of administrative autonomy for all groups of people that attain a certain degree of civilization, and for all the others a progressive participation in local government.

The conference is of opinion that the return of the colonies to those who possessed them before the war, or the exchange or compensations which might be effected, ought not to be an obstacle to the making of peace.

Those colonies that have been taken by conquest from any belligerent must be made the subject of special consideration at the peace conference, as to which the communities in their neighborhood will be entitled to take part. But the clause in the treaty of peace on this point must secure economic equality in such territories for the peoples of all nations, and thereby guarantee that none are shut out from legitimate access to raw materials; prevented from disposing of their own products, or deprived of their proper share of economic development.

As regards more especially the colonies of all the belligerents in tropical Africa, from sea to sea, including the whole of the region north of the Zambesi and south of the Sahara, the conference condemns any imperialist idea which would make these countries the booty of one or several nations, exploit them for the profit of the capitalist, or use them for the promotion of the militarist aims of the Governments.

With respect to these colonies the conference declares in favor of a system of control, established by international agreement, under the League of Nations and maintained by its guarantee, which, whilst respecting national sovereignty, would be alike inspired by broad conceptions of economic freedom and concerned to safeguard the rights of the natives under the best conditions possible for them, and in particular:

(1) It would take account in each locality of the wishes of the people, expressed in the form which is possible for them.

(2) The interests of the native tribes as regards the ownership of the soil would be maintained.

(3) The whole of the revenues would be devoted to the well-being and development of the colonies themselves.

ECONOMIC RELATIONS.

IV. The interallied conference declares against all the projects now being prepared by imperialists and capitalists, not in any one country only but in most countries, for an economic war, after peace has been secured, either against one or other foreign nation or against all foreign nations, as such an economic war, if begun by any country, would inevitably lead to reprisals, to which each nation in turn might in self-defense be driven. The main lines of marine communication should be open without hindrance to vessels of all nations under the protection of the League of Nations. The conference realizes that all attempts at economic aggression, whether by protective tariffs or capitalist trusts or monopolies, inevitably result in the spoliation of the working classes of the several countries for the profit of the capitalists; and the working class see in the alliance between the military imperialists and the fiscal protectionists in any country whatsoever not only a serious danger to the prosperity of the masses of the people but also a grave menace to peace.

On the other hand, the right of each nation to the defense of its own economic interests, and in face of the world shortage hereinafter mentioned, to the conservation for its own people of a sufficiency of its own supplies of foodstuffs and raw materials, can not be denied. The conference accordingly urges upon the labor and socialist parties of all countries the importance of insisting, in the attitude of the Government toward commercial enterprise, along with the necessary control of supplies for its own people, on the principle of the open door, and without hostile discrimination against foreign countries. But it urges equally the importance not merely of conservation, but also of the utmost possible development, by appropriate Government action, of the resources of every country for the benefit not only of its own people, but also of the world, and the need for an international agreement for the enforcement in all countries of the legislation on factory conditions, a maximum eight-hour day, the prevention of "sweating" and unhealthy trades necessary to protect the workers against exploitation and oppression, and the prohibition of night work by women and children.

THE PROBLEMS OF PEACE.

V. To make the world safe for democracy involves much more than the prevention of war, either military or economic. It will be a device of the capitalist interests to pretend that the treaty of peace need concern itself only with the cessation of the struggles of the armed forces and with any necessary territorial readjustments. The Interallied Conference insists that in view of the probable world-wide shortage after the war of exportable foodstuffs and raw materials, and of merchant shipping, it is imperative, in order to prevent the most serious hardships, and even possible famine, in one country or another, that systematic arrangements should be made on an international basis for the allocation and conveyance of the available exportable surpluses of these commodities to the different countries, in proportion, not to their purphasing powers, but to their several pressing needs; and that, within each country, the Government must for some time maintain its control of the most indispensable commodities in order to secure their appropriation, not in a competitive market mainly to the richer classes in proportion to their means, but, systematically, to meet the most urgent needs of the whole community on the principle of "no cake for anyone until all have bread."

Moreover, it can not but be anticipated that in all countries the dislocation of industry attendant on peace, the instant discharge of millions of munition makers and workers in war trades, and the demobilization of millions of soldiers—in face of the scarcity of industrial capital, the shortage of raw materials, and the insecurity of commercial enterprise—will, unless prompt and energetic action be taken by the several Governments, plunge a large part of the wage-earning population into all the miseries of unemployment more or less prolonged.

In view of the fact that widespread unemployment in any country, like a famine, is an injury not to that country alone but impoverishes also the rest of the world, the conference holds that it is the duty of every government to take immediate action, not merely to relieve the unemployed, when unemployment has set in, but actually, so far as may be practicable, to prevent the occurrence of unemployment. It therefore urges upon the labor parties of every country the necessity of their pressing upon their governments the preparation of plans for the execution of all the innumerable public works (such as the making and repairing of roads, railways and waterways, the erection of schools and public buildings, the provision of working-class dwellings and the reclamation and afforestation of land) that will be required in the near future, not for the sake of finding measures of relief for the unemployed but with a view to these works being undertaken at such a rate in each locality as will suffice, together with the various capitalist enterprises that may be in progress, to maintain at a fairly uniform level year by year, and throughout each year, the aggregate demand for labor, and thus prevent there being any unemployed. It is now known that in this way it is quite possible for any government to prevent, if it chooses, the occurrence of any widespread or prolonged involuntary unemployment, which if it is now in any country allowed to occur is as much the result of government neglect as is any epidemic disease.

RESTORATION OF THE DEVASTATED AREAS AND REPARATION OF WRONGDOING.

VI. The Interallied Conference holds that one of the most imperative duties of all countries immediately peace is declared will be the restoration, so far as may be possible, of the homes, farms, factories, public buildings, and means of communication whatever destroyed by war operations; that the restoration should not be limited to compensation for public buildings, capitalist undertakings, and material property proved to be destroyed or damaged, but should be extended to setting up the wage earners and peasants themselves in homes and employment; and that to insure the full and impartial application of these principles the assessment and distribution of the compensation, so far as the cost is contributed by any international fund, should be made under the direction of an international commission.

The conference will not be satisfied unless there is a full and free judicial investigation into the accusations made on all sides that particular governments have ordered and particular officers have exercised acts of cruelty, oppression, violence, and theft against individual victims, for which no justification can be found in the ordinary usages of war. It draws attention in particular to the loss of life and property of merchant seamen and other noncombatants (including women and children) resulting from this inhuman and ruthless conduct. It should be part of the conditions of peace that there should be forthwith set up a court of claims and accusations, which should investigate all such allegations as may be brought before it, summon the accused person or government to answer the complaint, to pronounce judgment, and award compensation or damages, payable by the individual or government condemned to the persons who had suffered wrong or to their dependents. The several governments must be responsible, financially and otherwise, for the presentation of the cases of their respective nationals to such a court of claims and accusations and for the payment of the compensation awarded.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

VII. The Interallied Conferene is of opinion that an international conference of labor and socialist organizations, held under proper conditions, would at this stage render useful service to world democracy by assisting to remove misunderstandings, as well as the obstacles which stand in the way of world peace.

Awaiting the resumption of the normal activities of the International Socialist Bureau, we consider that an international conference held during the period of hostilities should be organized by a committee whose impartiality can not be questioned. It should be held in a neutral country, under such conditions as would inspire confidence, and the conference should be fully representative of all the labor and socialist movements in all the belligerent countries accepting the conditions under which the conference is convoked.

As an essential condition to an international conference the commission is of opinion that the organizers of the conference should satisfy themselves that all the organizations to be represented put in precise form, by a public declaration, their peace terms in conformity with the principles, "no annexations or punitive indemnities, and the right of all peoples to self-determination," and that they are working with all their power to obtain from their governments the necessary guaranties to apply those principles honestly and unreservedly to all questions to be dealt with at any official peace conference.

In view of the vital differences between the allied countries and the central powers, the commission is of opinion that it is highly advisable that the conference should be used to provide an opportunity for the delegates from the respective countries now in a state of war to make a full and frank statement of their present position and future intentions, and to endeavor by mutual agreement to arrange a program of action for a speedy and democratic peace.

The conference is of opinion that the working classes, having made such sacrifices during the war, are entitled to take part in securing a democratic world peace, and that M. Albert Thomas (France), M. Emile Vanderveide (Belgium), and Mr. Arthur Henderson (Great Britain) be appointed as a commission to secure from all the Governments a promise that at least one representative of labor and socialism will be included in the official representation at any Government conference, and to organize a labor and socialist representation to sit concurrently with the official conference; further, that no country be entitled to more than four representatives at such conference.

The conference regrets the absence of representatives of American labor and socialism from the Interallied Conference, and urges the importance of securing their approval of the decisions reached. With this object in view, the conference agrees that a deputation, consisting of one representative from France, Belgium, Italy, and Great Britain, together with Camille Huysmans (secretary of the International Socialist Bureau), proceed to the United States at once, in order to confer with representatives of the American democracy on the whole situation of the war.

The conference resolves to transmit to the socialists of the central empires and of the nations allied with them the memorandum in which the conference has defined the conditions of peace, conformably with the principles of socialist and international justice. The conference is convinced that these conditions will commend themselves on reflection to the mind of every socialist, and the conference asks for the answer of the socialists of the central Empires, in the hope that these will join without delay in a joint effort of the international, which has now become more than ever the best and the most certain instrument of democracy and peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, there are several gentlemen from our larger States who have requested time to-day—four of them, I believe—and I have been looking for them for the last half hour, and I can not find any of them. Hence, so far as I am concerned, if the chairman so desires, the Clerk can begin the reading of the bill.

Mr. GILLETT. I think it fair to suggest that it was not expected to-day that the bill would be taken up. It was supposed that it would be taken up to-morrow, to-day being Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. DAVIS. I indorse what the gentleman has stated.

Mr. WALSH. I assume, if the debate is to proceed under the five-minute rule, that the gentleman should have a quorum here.

Mr. SISSON. We would like to read only a few sections in the fore part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That one half of the following sums, respectively, is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, namely:

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, strike out all the words in line 3, beginning with the word "that," and all the words in line 4, and all the words in line 5, and the words "District of Columbia" in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The following sums are appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to the extent that they are sufficient therefor, and the remainder out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but the amount to be paid from the Treasury of the United States shall in no event be as much as one-half of said expenses, in full for the following expenses for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, except amounts to pay the interest and sinking fund on the funded debt of said district, of which amounts one half is appropriated out of the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. SISSON. That it changes existing law. The present law regulating the District of Columbia provides that half the expenses of the District of Columbia shall be paid out of the District treasury and the other half out of the Federal Treasury. This amendment changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. GARD. The amendment is one which comes within the purview of the so-called Holman rule, as evidenced by a ruling of the same Chairman who occupied the chair when a similar amendment was presented in 1915, the exception being as to that part of the amendment which makes it germane where the appropriation to be made by the amendment is less than that carried in the original bill. This amendment so provides, and is practically the same amendment which this Chairman, sitting as the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole in 1915, determined to be a proper amendment, and is, I now submit, in every way a proper amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I looked at the amendment for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it was the identical amendment presented to the Chair two years ago. I think it was.

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I do not have the other amendment before me. I believe the first portion of the amendment to be identical with the amendment which was ruled upon by the Chair once before. I am not sure whether or not the latter clause in that amendment was passed upon by the Chair at that time, unless the gentleman from Ohio can state that it is the identical amendment.

Mr. GARD. It is the identical amendment, I will say to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has a recollection about that amendment, and if his memory serves him correctly it was very elaborately argued at that time, and the precedents were looked up, after which the point of order was overruled. Following that precedent, the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. Upon that point, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest the absence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the District of Columbia appropriation bill, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called and 247 Members had answered to their names, and he reported a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment offered by me is to carry into effect not alone two previous actions of this House, but also the unanimous action of a special commission, consisting of three United States Senators and three Members of the House of Representatives, who have made a finding, which finding is the same as that embodied in the amendment I have offered. Its purpose is to stand by the authorization of the issue of the funded debt of the District of Columbia, and when it comes to the payment of municipal expenses, it takes away the fiction of the half and half.

The so-called half-and-half matter has been discussed in the House many times, and the House has twice voted to strike it out because it served no useful purpose. It is purely and entirely a fiction. It can not accomplish any good for the District of Columbia, and it can only work harm to the general taxpayers of the United States, who are called upon to contribute money entirely unnecessary. It had its origin at a time when the assistance of the Federal Government was necessary to take care of certain extraordinary expenditures of the District. But now the District of Columbia, of which the city of Washington is the greater part, has a very small indebtedness; in fact, the indebtedness is being paid for in yearly proportions of appropriation, and in 1924 there will be absolutely no indebtedness. The tax receipts of the District of Columbia have grown largely, and are now far in excess of the tax revenues of 1878.

The plan proposed in this amendment is the sensible plan, the only plan which the cities, towns, and counties in which we live adhere to. The plan is that the District of Columbia shall pay a fair tax; that the rate shall be assessed on an equitable valuation of the real and personal property, and that that sum of money should be applied to the payment of the expenses of the District; that the necessary balance shall be contributed by the Federal Government; no matter what it may be, it shall be contributed so that the District of Columbia will have a proper and substantial government, because this is the national city of the country and should be a model for the capital cities of the world.

To show the limits to which we have gone, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the financial statement of the auditor of the District of Columbia for the year 1918, in which he showed that there is at this time a cash balance to the credit of the District of Columbia in the Treasury of the United States of $2,664,717.17, with another cash balance on account of the general fund, so that the Federal cash balances amount to $2,693,509.89 less certain District obligations on account of its share of unadvanced appropriations amounting to $1,313,290.99, leaving a resulting surplus of revenue from all appropriations and charges to and including June 30, 1916, as above stated, of $1,380,218.90.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The clerk of the Appropriations Committee informs me that at the end of the fiscal year the District of Columbia will have on hand a balance of approximately $5,000,000 for which it will have no use. In the meantime the United States Treasury is asked to contribute money to the municipal corporation, which has $5,000,000 to its credit.

Mr. GARD. In the report which was made accompanying this bill it is stated that the estimated surplus of the District revenues will amount to $1,482,301.67. These two amounts show, as the gentleman from Kentucky has well said, that in June, 1919, there will be approximately $5,000,000 in the revenues of the District of Columbia unappropriated and for which there is absolutely no use. The report of the committee discloses a number of most unusual expenses—I mean expenses unusual to the ordinary government of a city—and yet after these usual and unusual expenses at the end of the fiscal year 1919 nearly $5,000,000 will be in the treasury of the District of Columbia unappropriated, serving no useful purpose, and during all of that time the people of the United States are being continually asked to raise money for governmental purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. There is no sound sense in any municipal taxation which piles up a great amount of money in a municipal treasury, unexpended, unused, unasked for, and unnecessary, and that is the situation which to-day confronts the people of the United States and the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state whether any committee of Congress or otherwise has ever investigated this matter particularly and how recently?

Mr. GARD. I do not know whether the gentleman heard me or not, but I stated that in 1915 a special commission, consisting of three United States Senators and three Representatives in Congress, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and myself, was appointed to consider this matter, and that commission rendered a unanimous report, after practically a month's hearing, that there was no longer any necessity and no reason for adherence to that which is carried in this bill as the half-and-half principle. As I say, there is no reason for it, because it does not operate for any useful purpose. If it did, I would be the last to suggest its abolition.

It has simply resulted in the accumulation of unnecessary amounts of money, gathered from our people all throughout the States of the United States. It will have resulted in the accumulation of nearly $5,000,000 at the end of the next fiscal year. It can have no other effect, if it be continued for a year or two, than in resulting that the residents of the District of Columbia will have absolutely no taxes to pay. The situation is this, that the United States provides and provides abundantly for the District of Columbia. It holds this to be the national city, and it wants it to be a beautiful and well-kept and orderly city, the seat of this great Government. The Government takes great pride in the city of Washington and in the District of Columbia, and rightfully so, but I maintain there is no reason why the people of the United States should continue to put money into the treasury of the District of Columbia which is unnecessary and unused. Therefore I have offered this amendment, so that the system of taxation may be the same as the system of taxation in every other part of the United States, and that is a fair responsibility upon the part of the residents of the District in the payment of taxes and the recognition on the part of the United States that it is to pay the balance in affording the best facilities of government for this District.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I recollect very well when the half-and-half principle was adopted. It was then stated after something of an investigation that the Government of the United States owned one-half of the property in the District, and certainly if it owned one-half then it owns one-half now, and this law was made, as I understand it, in order that the Government should contribute one-half. I was not in the Chamber when the gentleman's amendment was offered, but if it be in order, and is to be voted upon, will it not result in taxing the property of the citizens of the District not only to support the District government, according to the amount of property, but in putting the whole burden upon the property owners of the District?

Mr. GARD. No.

Mr. CANNON. And as a part of my question I desire to say that I do not now own and never did own and never expect to own one foot of property in the District.

Mr. GARD. I will say for the information of the gentleman—and I think I state it advisedly—that the United States does not now own one-half of the property in the District of Columbia, or anything like it, nor did it ever own half the property in the District of Columbia, and that there is no question of increasing the taxation against any resident in the District. The only purpose of this amendment is to see to it that the estimated revenues, which from the District of Columbia are now $9,204,372, shall be applied toward the government of the District of Columbia, and that all of the other expenses, no matter what they may be—the balance—shall be contributed by the Federal Government; so that there is no increase against the individual taxpayer, and there should be no increase. He should be liable only for a just and fair assessment upon his property and for taxes to be paid as the result of a fair tax rate made upon that assessment.

Mr. CANNON. But if the policy is adopted that the gentleman suggests, as Congress is supreme touching taxation in the District, is it not likely that, without consultation with the inhabitants of the District, the taxes will be increased from time to time to raise the whole revenue from the private property in the District, notwithstanding the large amount of property owned by the Government, constantly increasing, and the policing and care of that property?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended.

Mr. GARD. I do not desire any further time unless the gentleman desires to ask a question.

Mr. CANNON. That is all.

Mr. GARD. I merely desire to say in answer that there is no possibility of an increase in taxation. There is no possibility of anything being done against the individual taxpayer which is not being done now. It is simply that the owner of property, either real estate or personal, shall contribute as do the people of every other city in the United States, a fair proportion of his property as a tax assessment for benefits received, and there his obligation as a resident ceases.

Mr. CANNON. How is that fair amount to be determined?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is already fixed by law.

Mr. GARD. To be determined as now. A man's property is assessed and the tax rate is applied and he pays taxes like the gentleman does in Danville.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman have any doubt if the policy he refers to shall be adopted as to whether the vast amount of property that the United States owns in the District will go without any contribution?

Mr. GARD. Oh, no; not the slightest doubt, because the United States is contributing continually and fully for the ordinary and usual running expenses of the District of Columbia, and pays entirely from the general funds in the Treasury the expenses incident to and necessary for special improvements, such as the erection of new Government buildings and necessary municipal utilities.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, of course Members of the House who have been here for several terms without doubt know that this House has repeatedly passed that amendment by an overwhelming majority. The last vote taken on this matter passed this House by more than 2 to 1.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. More than 100 majority.

Mr. SISSON. And as a last resort a gentleman at that time a Member of the House—Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama—amended the conference report by inserting in that report the appointment of this commission, three members from the House and three members from the Senate. The joint committee met and went carefully into this matter and made their report to Congress. This is a result of the report of that committee and is exactly what was done by the Committee on Appropriations when Mr. Page, of North Carolina, was then chairman of the subcommittee and Mr. DAVIS and I were the two conferees, and the bill passed the House and went to the Senate; and, as I said a moment ago, there the matter was hung up in conference, until we finally just quit and declined to have any further conferences. It was thought at that juncture that the House having instructed us by two overwhelming votes to insist upon that amendment we felt that we were not bound to continue the conference further. Then the gentleman from Alabama, as I stated, offered that compromise. That report has been filed. The expenses of that joint committee were paid out of the funds of the two Houses. So it seems to me that nothing could be fairer than to say that the people of the District of Columbia shall pay only a fair rate of taxation on a fair assessment of property and that that is all they should pay, and if Congress then desires to expend more money than that out of the Federal Treasury it is up to the Congress to do that, and we assume that responsibility. One moment more. If we as Congressmen feel that we do the people of the District of Columbia an injustice, and I am sure we would not, then we ought not to pass this legislation; but there are many things that are being done in the District of Columbia by Congress which would surprise Members of Congress unless they should investigate the matter. There are many Members of Congress who perhaps do not know that the water system in the District of Columbia is owned by the United States Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And built at the Government's expense.

Mr. SISSON. The aqueduct that brings the water from Great Falls here was built by the Federal Government; every penny of it was paid out of the Federal Treasury. The water mains were all laid out of the United States Treasury, and the District of Columbia contributed nothing. Now, a great many large pieces of property here in the District of Columbia belong to the Government, and yet the Government pays the expense of keeping up the property in respect to sidewalks and streets——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The income from the water exceeds the outgo, does it not?

Mr. SISSON. Well, it is behind now; considerably behind. I will state to the gentleman there has been a change in the last appropriation bill in reference to the water rents. Formerly it all went into the Treasury, and the United States Government then paid all the expenses of the water system. Now the money, of course, still goes into the Treasury, but the expenses of the water system are paid out of the revenues of the water company itself.

Mr. CANNON. One hand washes the other, and then leaves something to the credit of the United States.

Mr. SISSON. The difference is it keeps the books entirely separate, and the water system is self-sustaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. As a member of this committee I have investigated this matter with a great deal of care. This amendment will not change the rate of taxation, will not change the assessment, will not change the machinary of assessment, will not change the machinery of collection in the least, and the District citizens will pay not a single penny more than they now pay. The only thing that this amendment does is to provide that before any money shall come out of the Federal Treasury you must first use the money collected on the property in the District of Columbia. Then the balance of this appropriation would be paid out of the Federal Treasury. Now, that is all there is to the amendment.

Mr. JUUL and Mr. CRISP rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] is recognized.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I understand that the fiscal year ends June 30, 1919, and that it is proposed in this bill, H. R. 11692, to appropriate for the expenses of the District of Columbia the sum of $13,426,393.66. I understand further that the General Government and the District of Columbia each are required to pay $6,713,196.83. In the first place, I want it distinctly understood that I am friendly to the District, and if this was a bill to give every man and woman of legal age in the District a vote I would favor it.

We are fighting a great war for democracy, and one of the measures we should hurry along here is to do everything to establish democracy at home, and granting the franchise to Washingtonians would be right in line. But I am unable to understand by what manner of reasoning a wealthy city like Washington, which probably in normal times is having from seventy-five to one hundred millions disbursed among its citizens by the National Government annually, should draw on the States in the Union for any aid toward defraying expenses of its local government.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, the sum contributed by the States toward running the local expenses of the District of Columbia was $515,793.83 less than the sum to be contributed this year.

The contribution of my State, based upon its population, was as follows:

Toward the District schools	$98,028
For street sewers and water mains	37,676
For police	31,277
For local improvements and repairs	70,775
For salaries and help	25,470
For interest—sinking fund	29,887
For lighting	14,254
For fire department	20,455
For charities and corrections	42,807
Miscellaneous	9,916

Or a total for Illinois of $379,945; that is, provided that Illinois contributed only according to population. But everybody knows that the larger States in the Union contributed sums far in excess of the figures here mentioned. And not one dollar of these sums could by any stretch of the imagination be said to be expended for national purposes.

On the above basis New York contributed $614,103 and the State of Georgia $175,810 toward paying the local expense of the city of Washington.

Now, I can understand that the United States Government ought to pay its share for street improvements outside of public buildings, and I can further understand that if there is a public building on one side of the street and no private one on the opposite side of the street that probably the Nation should be generous and pay the total cost of such local improvements as might become necessary from time to time. But I absolutely fail to understand why a community like Washington, with a flood of gold being poured daily into its lap, should pass the hat around to the 48 States in the Union and ask them to contribute toward its local expenses.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is making a very interesting statement of this question, but I would like to ask him how he computes the different amounts.

Mr. JUUL. I will give it to the gentleman in a couple of minutes. I would not like to give it in my own time, as I have only five minutes.

To illustrate the situation fully by comparing the District of Columbia, or, rather, the city of Washington, with another great city, I want to repeat here that the tax rate in Washington is $1.50 per $100 assessed valuation, and that customarily only 66⅔ per cent of the fair cash value of the property here is assessed. The city of Chicago contains about seven townships, and in these townships the tax rate varies slightly on account of the park taxes, which are not uniform.

The property there is assessed on the basis of one-third of the fair cash value, but instead of having one tax to pay, as in Washington, the following taxes were levied and collected for the year 1916:

State tax	$0.80
County tax	.66
City tax	1.97
School tax	1.87
Sanitary district	.38
Park tax	.70
Total	6.38

So it will be readily realized that if Congress should decide that Washington should pay its own bills, apparently no hardships would be imposed upon the city.

The answer to all this, of course, might be that the taxes in Washington are not too low, but that the taxes of Chicago are too high, and to the latter part of such proposition I would cheerfully agree, only stating that as a State official in Illinois I and many friends labored hard, as everyone knows in that State, to keep the taxes down, but that the ever-increasing demands of the taxing bodies and the ever-increasing accommodations given to the public in the form of great hospitals, bathing beaches, public baths, playgrounds, libraries, and so forth, brought the taxes up to what they now are in spite of us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I believe, in theory, at least, in the State of Illinois, but not in practice, much less property is assessed according to its value and then divided by three, and then that one-third, the gentleman says, is paid, which would make 2 per cent on its value; and yet it is an open secret that the property in the State of Illinois is not assessed, in the first place, at three-fourths of its value.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman from Illinois states exactly what was correct, but I also want to say for the benefit of the gentleman and the other gentlemen upon this floor that in the State of Illinois, in addition to the approximate 6 per cent on one-third of the fair cash value, there is a special assessment for every local improvement.

In order to be perfectly sure that the property in the District is being assessed on approximately 66⅔ of its present value and that the percentage assessment in Washington as quoted by me here is correct, I called up the tax department in the assessor's office and had the figures verified over the telephone.

It would seem to me that this city ought to be in a position where it could take care of its local expenses and let the Government of the United States devote its $6,713,196.83 that it is proposed to take out of the National Treasury for national purposes.

I repeat, that it ought to be possible to take this vast sum, which certainly represents the liberty-loan purchases of several thousand people, and use the money to buy wheat, bacon, clothing, and supplies for our soldiers who are now fighting the battles of our country.

Here is $6,713,196.83 as a gift or a grant to one of the wealthiest cities in this Union. The only excuse I have heard since I came to Washington as to why the citizens of this city should not pay the expenses of running the city is, "Why should we pay at all? We have no vote." I maintain the bill now pending here does not remedy that evil, but I want to tell you, gentlemen, the day ought to come sooner or later when every citizen of this community should wish to look the citizens from the other parts of the country in the face and wish to pay their own expenses here and not look to the rest of the country for charity.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asked me what I based my figures on. I want to say to the gentleman the tabulation I have here is for the year 1912-13, and the amount——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked me on what these figures were based. I want to say they are based on the amount levied against the United States Government for District purposes for the fiscal year of 1911-12. And these figures are, as I stated a minute ago, within $515,793.83 identically the figures of the present year. Now, in that year the gentleman's State of Massachusetts contributed a total of $226,849 toward running local expenses of the city of Washington. And I maintain that the city of Washington does not need it, ought not to have it, and should not ask for it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. How did the States contribute that money—by a levy of the Government upon each State?

Mr. JUUL. No. Each State pays whatever it has to pay in the form of a tax, internal revenue or otherwise. For instance, the city of Peoria, in my State, has been in the habit of tossing from $65,000,000 to $70,000,000 into the National Treasury. The supposition is that that amount of money was tossed into the National Treasury for national purposes.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, it is based on population?

Mr. JUUL. Yes. Instead of utilizing it for national purposes, a part of it at least is being used for local purposes. That is what I object to.

Mr. WALSH. But it is taken out of the returns for internal revenue and income taxes?

Mr. JUUL. Yes, sir. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] is recognized.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important question. It means the changing of the system of raising revenue and spending it in the city of Washington and the District of Columbia. It may be an old proposition to the older Members here. It is entirely new to the newer Members.

This question was not raised in any manner before the committee having this investigation in charge. It is of sufficient importance, it occurs to me, to warrant its being made an independent measure, where all those interested might have a chance to be heard. I do not think that it is quite fair to the committee itself; I do not believe that it is fair to the people who are vitally affected by it. It is of no concern to me as an individual, except as one of the one hundred million people in the United States. It may be of very great concern to those whose interests are all in the city of Washington.

Above all other times, it occurs to me that this is the most inappropriate time for this radical change. We are living under abnormal conditions throughout this country; in the city of Washington they are more abnormal than in any other place in the United States. By reason of these great war activities here a great amount of wear and tear is going on constantly that would not be reckoned under ordinary circumstances. You take the streets of the city of Washington. They are in bad condition and growing worse constantly by reason of the Government's large trucks and the immense amount of hauling over them, which would not be permitted under any ordinary circumstances.

We saw here the other day that great, immense tank which was brought over here by reason of the war and for the purpose of encouraging and developing enthusiasm for the sale of the Government's bonds. We saw that immense tank going over the streets of the city and tearing up the paving, much of it, all to pieces. Therefore, it seems to me this is not the time for this change to be made.

I realize that much may be said in favor of this proposition, and I dare say that if it were taken up for investigation much might be said against it. But it occurs to me that now, while this city is torn up from one end to the other by building activities, different from the ordinary conditions in the city of Washington, this radical change should not be had, and this radical change should not be had at any time without the people vitally affected having their day in court.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. Is the report of the commission referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] in the hands of the Appropriations Committee or of the District Committee?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is not. I never heard of it before. This question was not even mooted during the weeks of hearings that we had on the bill in the committee. Therefore I say that to the Members of this body who are new here, this is entirely a new and novel question; and it occurs to me that it is of such vital importance that the fullest development of facts and the fullest hearings should be had before any steps are taken toward making this change. If it is a good thing, it will last. They have been under this system for many years, and the results have not been disastrous. They might be disastrous now if the proposed changes were made, and we might bring injustice to those upon whom we would not care to have it brought. If the change is to be had, it should be had in normal times. It should not be had in times so abnormal as we now have in the city of Washington. Therefore I think this amendment should not be carried. It should be at least deferred until the next session of this Congress, when hearings might be had and when those of us who are not acquainted with these investigations might have the opportunity at least of being permitted to read them before we are required to vote upon the question.

The assertion is made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] who is the proponent of this amendment, that it will make no change whatever in the taxation, that it will make no change as far as the assessment of values is concerned. Then what is the real purpose? The real purpose must be that the money now in the Treasury may be expended for governmental purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That money may be needed to make the repairs I have spoken about and to replace the wear and tear that is now going on by reason of these extraordinary activities. In any event this radical change should not be made at this time, and until there has been a full and fair investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has just urged that this is not the appropriate time for this change to take place. That argument has been used for many years, until it has become an established fact that an appropriate time will never come for those who favor the continuance of the half-and-half. When a similar amendment was last before the House that same argument was used. Finally, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has just stated, the matter got into conference and was there being thrashed out. When the conferees were deadlocked on the subject Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, who was then in the House, offered an amendment providing for a commission to investigate this matter and report to Congress, and that was adopted. Three Members of the Senate were appointed and three Members of the House were appointed. If I remember correctly—and I am quite sure I do—all six of those Members voted against doing away with the half-and-half plan; but when they had investigated the subject they brought in a report saying that the half-and-half plan was no longer necessary or advisable. Their report is accessible to every Member who wishes to see it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. When was that report filed? I have forgotten.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

Mr. GARD. It was filed early in January, 1916.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The question arises, what is the use of continuing the half-and-half proposition? Why should the United States Government continue to match dollar for dollar that is raised here in the way of taxation? As a result of the United States going into her Treasury to pay half, at the end of the next fiscal year there will have accumulated in the treasury of the District of Columbia a surplus of approximately $5,000,000. Now, with approximately $5,000,000 in the treasury of the District of Columbia, why should the United States go into her own Treasury to pay any part of the expenses? If there was a deficit in the District treasury, or if the entire amount of money raised by the District of Columbia was being used, then it might be argued that it was worth while to go into the Treasury of the United States to aid the District of Columbia; but with a surplus accumulating all the while, I can not see the necessity for continuing the half-and-half.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. CANNON. I believe this $5,000,000 to the credit of the District of Columbia is deposited in the United States Treasury?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is there as a trust fund.

Mr. CANNON. As a trust fund, and can not get out except by legislation of Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It can not.

Mr. CANNON. So the United States has the use of it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But why compel the United States to contribute to a municipal corporation that is so prosperous that it has to its credit $5,000,000 more than it needs?

Mr. CANNON. And the United States contributes its half, and that remains in the Treasury, does it not, until it is paid out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It remains there until the Commissioners of the District of Columbia draw their warrant against it and take it out and spend it.

Mr. CANNON. If they do, it has got to be done under law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. CARY. Is it not a fact that the Government also builds the streets and sewers in the city of Washington?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The streets are built on the half-and-half plan. It has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that somebody has said that the Government owns half the property here.

The Government never has owned that much. Way back yonder in Boss Shepherd's time he got up a table in which he charged all the streets to the United States, all the public space to the United States, all that is in the rivers to the United States, and all the parks to the United States. He charged all these up to the ownership of the United States, and then could not make it appear that the United States owned half of the area of the District of Columbia; but, driven to a final statement, he said the Government then owned approximately half of the values in the District of Columbia. But even that was not true. Now, the claim is made, particularly by the editor of the Star, who seems to be the spokesman for the District of Columbia, not that the District of Columbia pays a greater rate of tax than any other city of comparable size but that the people here pay a greater per capita tax than is paid in other cities. There are a number of rich men here and there are a number of poor people as well. The poor people own nothing or but little and the rich own a great deal, and, in that way, the per capita tax is great. When it comes down to the property tax, I maintain that it is less in this city than in any other city of a comparable size in the world.

Three years ago I made a speech on the subject, and at that time I had before me 40 cities, 20 a little larger in population than the District of Columbia and 20 just a little smaller than the population of the District of Columbia. The property tax in the District of Columbia was less than in any of them. Now, bear in mind one thing, you gentlemen who have not heard the matter discussed before, in the District of Columbia there is but one tax, and that is a municipal tax. The real estate is taxed at a rate of $1.50 a hundred on a two-thirds valuation, which makes it only $1 a hundred. That is the only tax it pays, while in every other city of the United States there is a municipal tax, a county tax, and also a State tax. Then it pays school and other special taxes. Here they pay one tax, which makes it a very much less tax than in any other city in the world.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I want to state for the benefit of the gentleman that in my city we pay a local park tax of $1 on the valuation, also a municipal, county, and State tax, besides a sanitary tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Before concluding my remarks I wish again to call attention to the fact that during the entire controversy in years gone by the editor of the Washington Star, speaking for the District, has insisted that the half-and-half plan should not be abolished until a fair commission had been appointed to determine whether or not it ought to be done. When this commission was appointed, consisting of six men, every one of whom voted against the abolition of the half-and-half plan, the Star said it was a fair commission, made up of men who were absolutely impartial. Now, when they have reported, the advocates of the half-and-half plan wish to repudiate that report made by the commission selected in the way I have named, and which everyone has said was fair and impartial.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes. I have taken but very little time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to those who have been here some time I can add nothing to what I have already said on the floor of the House in advocacy of the repeal of what is known as the half-and-half act. In the Sixty-third Congress I introduced a bill to repeal it and made a lengthy speech in favor of the abolition of this law. To the new Members let me say in that Congress the House overwhelmingly passed a bill to repeal the act of June 11, 1878, known as the half-and-half act, and it went to the Senate and there died. In the succeeding Congress similar action was taken in this House, and the Senate again defeated the bill.

Now, there is a great misconception or ignorance among the membership of the House generally as to the municipal laws and affairs in the District of Columbia. It may astonish some of you to learn that when the Government took charge of this territory in 1800, two years thereafter, on May 2, 1802, Congress chartered the city of Washington, so that the city of Washington is a municipal corporation. From that time to 1871 the city of Washington had a mayor and council, managed its own affairs, levied its own taxes, and conducted its business the same as Chicago, Milwaukee, Cleveland, or any other city in the United States. The Government had nothing whatever to do with the municipality save that the Government in a spirit of fairness and equity yearly made such contributions to the municipal government of the city of Washington as Congress thought just, in view of the amount of property the Government owned in the District of Columbia.

This condition continued until 1874, when a commission form of government was created for the District. Why was a commission form of government established? Because in 1867 a law was passed conferring the right of franchise upon the negroes in the District, and they became such an active, discordant element in municipal politics that this commission form of government was adopted. In 1878 the act known as the half-and-half act was passed. Under that act the people here voluntarily gave up their right to vote, and the act provided that the General Treasury should pay half the expenses of the municipal government. My very distinguished and much admired friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], in this discussion asked as to the amount of property the Government owned at that time. I have in my hands a copy of a speech which I made upon the floor of the House several years ago relative to this question, and in it I have some figures as to the amount of land owned by the Government. At the time the act known as the half-and-half act was passed there were 6,110 acres of land in the city of Washington covered by that act and the Government owned only 1,523 acres, and nearly all of the land that the Government owned consisted of parks, and the citizens of Washington, of course, got the greatest benefit from those parks. At the present time there are 38,000 acres of land, including the streets and sidewalks, in the District. The Government owns 5,000 acres, and I venture to say there are not 400 acres owned by the Government used exclusively by the Government for its governmental activities. The rest of it is to be found in parks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman means that not 400 acres are used exclusively by the Government?

Mr. CRISP. That is what I tried to make plain.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I went into that subject thoroughly, and I found there are less than 50 acres in the District of Columbia used exclusively for Government purposes.

Mr. CRISP. I wanted to be absolutely fair to the District.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And there are 45,000 acres in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRISP. That effectually disposes of the question of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

What does the proposed amendment do? The proposed amendment simply provides that the citizens of Washington shall be required to pay a reasonable tax, Congress to determine what amount that tax shall be, and when the taxes are paid all the money thus raised shall first be expended in paying the municipal expenses of the District of Columbia, and then whatever other money is necessary, which Congress in its judgment deems should be expended, is to be appropriated out of the General Treasury. What will be the practical effect of this law if it is carried on for a year or two longer? I assert that the citizens of the city of Washington pay a lower rate of property tax than the people of any other city near its size anywhere in the world. Up to the time of the agitation for the repeal of the half-and-half act, there was no tax whatever here on intangible personal property such as money, notes, mortgages, and so forth. Now there is a small tax of three-tenths of 1 per cent upon intangible personal property. The tax upon tangible personal property is $1.50 a hundred, but there is a tax exemption, I think, of about $1,000 worth of household furniture, and so forth. The tax upon real estate is $1.50 a hundred, assessed upon a two-thirds valuation, which makes $1 a hundred upon the value of the property.

Bear in mind that in your State, gentlemen, you have a city tax, you have a county tax, you have a State tax. There is only one tax here. There is no State tax, there is no county tax. It is simply this city tax, and the tax on real estate is $1 a hundred. I challenge any one of you to get up and say that in your State, if you live in a city, that your people do not pay a higher tax on real estate than $1 on the hundred, if such is the case. That is the low rate of taxation here. Carry this act to its logical conclusion and a year or two from now it may not be necessary to levy any taxes here for a year or more. Why? As has been stated in this debate, there is now in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia over $2,000,000. At the end of June 30, 1918, it is estimated there will be over $4,000,000 to the credit of the District in the Treasury. In the next year or two, if this surplus continues to be added to, you will have six or seven million dollars in the Treasury to the credit of the District, and then you will not have to levy any tax rate here upon private property, because if you have half enough in the Treasury to the credit of the District to meet one-half of the annual appropriation budget, the United States must pay the other half; thus you have ample funds according to the half-and-half law to pay the entire expenses of the municipality, without levying one cent of tax on private property owners in the District. The people of the several States would be made to bear the tax burdens of the District, in addition to paying their own taxes.

Now, that is why we who believe this law is unjust to the people of the United States are asking that this half-and-half act be repealed. I would not do the citizens of Washington an injustice. I know the Federal Government owns large amounts of property here, and I do not want the Federal activities to be a burden upon the citizens of Washington. I want the Federal Government to pay whatever is equitable, right, and just on account of the property it owns here, but I do not want the people here to be immune from taxation and your constituents and my constituents be made to pay their tax burden. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to take any time now; if so, how much does he want?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Five minutes at least.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of 10 minutes all debate on this amendment close, and I will state that as soon as the vote is taken on this amendment I expect to move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close at the end of 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I have given some thought to this matter as it has been before the House from time to time, but I think I have never before taken part in the discussion. I recognize what has been said, as I think others should, that perhaps the half-and-half system is not exactly right or just to the Federal Government, but because of that I am not prepared to accept as correct the plan suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] in the amendment he has offered. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that this Government ought to escape taxes upon its vast property in the city of Washington or that it ought to pay taxes only in case the people of the city fail to contribute enough money to meet all expenses. I think the Government, owning property of immense value here, ought to pay some taxes; that the Congress ought to be able to determine how much money is necessary to meet expenses of running the city and to make all necessary and proper improvements; that it ought in some way to determine the proportion that the Government should pay and the remaining portion that the people of the District should pay on their property. Now, it is urged by the gentlemen supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] that as the Government contributes in lieu of taxes one-half of the expenses of this city, and the taxable property of the city pays the other half, that because the people and the property of Washington pay a small amount of money, smaller in proportion to the value of the property than is paid in any other city in the country, that therefore it is wrong and that the city is imposing upon the Government. I do not believe that. The people of this city may be so fortunately situated that they can escape a large burden of taxation. If they can properly do so it is their right and privilege. Gentlemen who have spoken lay it as a charge against the people of Washington that their tax rate is low and that taxes are less in proportion to value of property and advantages enjoyed than in other cities of the country; that property owners of Washington have to pay only one tax, a city tax, instead of a number of taxes, such as city, county, and State taxes, as the people of almost every other city in the country have to pay. Washington and its people are not to be blamed for that condition; it is a privilege they enjoy or a burden they escape. It is pointed out that the valuation of taxable property is only two-thirds of the full value and that the rate is only 1½, making a rate of taxation of 1 per cent on the full value, as in some States. That is certainly a very low rate, but the people of this city may be entitled to it. If the Government contributes what it ought to contribute in proportion to the value of its property, if the burden placed upon the people of the District is so reduced that it is only 1 per cent—to an insignificantly small sum—the people of the city are entitled to the benefit of it.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I am afraid I have not the time, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. If there is a surplus in the Treasury, is it not true that probably that could be very well expended for improvements that are very much needed?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The fact that there is money in the Treasury indicates that too much has been levied, that is all.

Mr. FESS. Has not been expended.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Perhaps so, but it is true also that too much has been levied. The answer is that the people of the city have paid such a small amount. No people are ever asked or ought to be asked to pay more than enough to run their Government, and the fact that money is left in the Treasury is an indication that the people of the District have paid more than they ought to have been asked to pay under the plan in vogue; that is, the half-and-half plan.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I am afraid I can not. If the half-and-half plan is not right, let it be two-thirds on the city and one-third on the Government, or let it be four-fifths on the city and one-fifth on the Government, but I insist the Federal Government ought not, in justice and right, to escape taxation on all its immense property in this city.

There is a Government building in the city in which I live. The Government pays nothing on it; no taxes. I have heard gentlemen say here that by analogy the Government of the United States ought not to be required to pay taxes on any of its property here. I do not believe that. I do not think the cases are parallel. I think the Government of the United States ought not to pay on its post-office building in my city, but I think it ought to pay, and pay properly, on its immense holdings in the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this city has benefited immensely by the location of the National Capital here. There are half a dozen cities—I do not know but there are a dozen—that would gladly pay the cost of every public improvement we have in this city and guarantee to never ask a cent from the Public Treasury if only the Capital could be moved there. Every day thousands of dollars are brought in here by reason of the Capital being located at this point. The city benefits every year hundreds of thousands of dollars by reason of the Capital being here. And if, in my judgment, there was a proper civic spirit on the part of the citizens of this city they would never be asking in time of war that they should not pay the same rate of taxation that is paid in other towns.

Now, what is the situation? A vast fund of millions of dollars has been accumulated in the Treasury. For what purpose? In order that they may be able to reach the time when it will equal the one-half they ought to pay, and then they will not have to pay a cent. It is said that public improvements are needed here. If so, why do not they take this fund and apply it in that way? Why do not they use this money for that purpose instead of endeavoring to create a fund so that they will pay no taxes whatever? Why, at this time, Mr. Chairman, when we are struggling in every way possible to raise the money that is necessary to carry on this great war, do these people come in here and say that they do not even want to pay ordinary taxes the same as are paid in other towns, instead of paying less to-day than is paid in any other city in the country?

Now, what is asked by this amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]? What can be fairer than to ask that this fund, which has come out of the low rate of taxes, should be applied to the necessary expenses of this city? If the streets need improving, let them improve them; but, from what I have seen around here, I think somebody has been sitting up of nights trying to find some way of putting more money and more expense on the streets and improvements in this town. A gentleman said that tanks go over the streets and are hard on the paving, but this is not the only town in which tanks have been exhibited. Trucks go over the streets; so they do in other cities. Are the other cities complaining and asking that the Government should contribute more money in order that they may escape their share of just taxation? What reason is there why this amendment should not prevail? There is none, in fairness and justice.

Every citizen of this country at this time should come forward and say, "I want to pay my fair share of taxes. I do not want to be deprived of the privilege of paying my fair share of taxes in this crisis of my country's affairs and when so much money is needed in the country's Treasury." But Washington, I believe, is the only city that can be found where such circumstances could exist. They are unwilling to pay even this lower rate of taxation, which has produced this great fund. They say that the Government owns a large amount of property here. So it has in value. Who takes care of it? The Government. Does it cost the city of Washington anything to police the Capitol or the other Government buildings? No; there would be the same expense for police if these buildings were not here. Do they pay for the walks around them or paving the roads on Government grounds? No. Do they pay for the water supply here or any expenses connected with Government property? No; not a cent. If all this Government property was removed, what would be the difference to the city so far as expenses are concerned? Its officers do not care for it. They pay no attention to it. They have no relation to it.

By the lavish expenditure of public money we have created here the most beautiful city in all this broad land. We have adorned it with magnificent buildings, upon some of which the treasures of art and architecture have been lavished without regard to expense. Hundreds of millions of dollars of public money have been spent upon its broad avenues, its shaded streets, its parks and grounds in making it the cleanest and handsomest city in all America. To this the whole population of the country have contributed, although an insignificant portion only will ever so much as see the objects upon which their money has been spent. Far from objecting to this, the people generally wish to make Washington a show city and the pride of the Nation. They only ask that its citizens shall pay the same taxes as they themselves do. In order that this may be done I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 2, 1918.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for Thy great love and for the multitude of Thy tender mercies. We thank Thee for all the provisions of Thy grace and for our marvelous opportunities amid the dangers of to-day. We thank Thee for all the supplies Thou hast through Thy kind providence placed in our hands. Help us to lay hold upon these forces for meeting all the demands that are upon us and for meeting the demands of this critical time.

O Thou God of battles, help us at this time. Strengthen our armies that are battling for the right across the seas to-day. Uphold Thou the laws of justice and righteousness for which they contend and which are the habitations of Thy throne. As Thy right hand and Thy holy arm brought victory to Israel in the long ago, so may we trust in Thy almighty power to-day, and may the time speedily arrive when wars shall cease to the ends of the earth and when permanent peace shall be established among all nations. We ask it in the name of Christ the Lord. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore assumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, April 30, 1918, when, on request of Mr. OVERMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the other day I presented to the Senate a communication written by Mr. Gutzon Borglum to the New York Times relating to our aeroplane service. It was stated on the floor by certain of my friends on the other side of the Chamber at that time that there were intimations that Mr. Borglum had some financial interest connected in some way with aeroplanes or aeronautics. I did not know about that matter and could not say anything about it at all, and so I was unprepared to enter upon that phase of it. Of course, if he had, naturally any criticism that he made upon the service or the production of aircraft would be to a certain extent discounted.

I have received from Mr. Borglum a telegram which, I think, in justice to him ought to be read by the Secretary, giving his statement about whether he is interested or not financially. I should like to have the Secretary read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STAMFORD, CONN., April 30, 1918.

Senator BRANDEGEE,
Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.:

Please deny absolutely that I had or have interest in any aeroplane company or monetary benefits by result of inquiry. That lie and others invented by interests who most dread investigation, and since middle of January have used every means to invalidate and interfere even with Senate inquiry. I also deny that I have discussed other than general evidence with anybody, nor will I, except before a judicial nonpartisan body. My letter to Times, written solely to protest against aeromobile interests blaming Squier for everything. Aeronautic production is still in the clutches of the ring and no headway will be made by Mr. Ryan or anyone else until that is broken up. Tell Senator THOMAS that the only reason my inquiry hurts anybody is that it is expert. My inquiry was finished February 12.

GUTZON BORGLUM.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The New York Times on yesterday published a review of the report, with the full text of the findings of the Aeronautical Society of America, in relation to this same subject, and I ask that that be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary proceeded to read and was interrupted by

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask what the Secretary is reading? I have just come into the Chamber.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He is reading an account in the New York Times of the report of the investigations of the Aeronautical Society of America.

Mr. THOMAS. In yesterday's issue?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes, sir; in yesterday's issue.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH subsequently said: Mr. President, in view of the statement made a few moments ago by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] with respect to the report of the Aeronautical Society of America, out of order I ask unanimous consent that the full report be included in the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who is just now absent from the Chamber and who made the original request. Objection was made by the Senator from Arkansas, which was later withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire it printed in the RECORD in lieu of the partial report?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In lieu of the partial report, as read from a copy of a newspaper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

THE AERONAUTICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA (INC.),
New York, April 2, 1918.

FREDERICK W. BARKER, Esq.,
President of the Aeronautical Society of America,
New York City.

SIR: I beg to transmit herewith the first report of the investigating committee of the Aeronautical Society of America.

Respectfully,

LEON CAMMEN, Chairman.

REPORT.

The investigating committee of the Aeronautical Society of America was appointed in August, 1917, with instructions to follow the developments in the execution of the aeronautical program and to advise the society of any opportunities which might offer themselves for it to be of service to our Government.

It has, however, become apparent at an early date that the execution of the aeronautical program was being diverted into paths where the possibility of success was distinctly imperiled. As time went on the committee saw with dismay the issuance of statements by the Government which it was compelled to regard as untrue. For a while it was under the impression that such statements were issued for the deliberate purpose of misleading the enemy. It regrets to have to say, however, that it has become apparent since that it was to mislead the American people that these statements were issued.

A still more threatening feature of the situation appeared to be the growing lack of coordination between the engineering and the production departments, clearly indicating that neither realized the nature of the work which they had to do and the means by which success in such an undertaking could be accomplished.

The committee found that the organization of production was such that delays would be inevitable. Not only that, but the production was so organized that no effective plans were made to keep the American aviation engineering at least on the same level of excellence as that of the enemy.

As men familiar with the art and having information concerning the military use of aircraft, the committee was frankly horrified to find that American aviators, the flower of the youth of this country, might be sent up ultimately in inferior planes—sent practically to certain death.

The situation was far too serious for either the committee or the society to keep silent, as silence in such a case would be treasonable.

Hence the committee has made several efforts to bring the results of this investigation to the attention of the proper officers of the Government, but has not been successful in accomplishing this end. On all occasions it has been told that the situation is either well in hand or will be so in the briefest time. In fact, when Mr. Howard E. Coffin, director of this society and chairman of the Aircraft Board, appeared before the board of directors of the society in February, 1918, to explain the present aeronautical situation, he claimed that while certain delays have occurred in the past, the entire production schedule has been on the whole maintained in a satisfactory manner. Questions by some of the directors have, however, elicited information which indicated that the situation was by no means as rosy as represented.

Briefly, the committee came to the conclusion that—

(1) Practically all statements issued by the officers of the Government with respect to the execution of the aircraft program must be absolutely neglected as being untrustworthy, as representing the situation in a misleading and overoptimistic manner, and as sometimes containing matter indicating the technical ignorance of those who compose such statements.

(2) That the very vigorous censorship over all matters connected with the execution of the aircraft program has been of no military value whatsoever, as it failed to conceal from the enemy that which ought to have been concealed, and at the same time precluded effective cooperation with the Government on behalf of the American engineering profession. In fact, the committee ventures to express its conviction that the only purpose of the rigor of the censorship was to preclude the country from finding out the character of the official statements.

(3) That accidents in training, while not perhaps excessively numerous, have been of such a nature as to indicate that in part they were preventable, and again in part were due to improper organization of flying and improper handling of machines.

(4) The recruiting of men for the flying and nonflying services has been such as to create a vast amount of uncertainty in the minds of our young people, and has been lately entirely discontinued, with the grave possibility that men who would make first-class flyers are being deflected into other classes of service, where they may not be as useful and are lost to the aircraft service.

(5) The state of research in the country is such that at the time when the enemy is bending every effort toward producing better, faster, and bigger machines the American inventive genius is left unutilized, with the result that delays occur through ignorance of conditions and no improvements are made, either in the planes now being produced or in those which may be expected to be produced, for the program of 1919. In other words, even the program of the next year is imperiled unless steps are radically taken to combat this evil.

(6) The production of the fighting planes for the front is lagging through lack of cooperation between the engineering, procurement, and production departments, which is due to their failure to understand how a vast production of aeroplanes should be organized.

(7) The entire system of production is such that delays will grow with the rate of production, and the program lacks flexibility to such an extent that no really large production from this country can be expected unless the entire system is basically changed.

(8) The Liberty motor is doubtless a good design basically, but has been largely discredited by exaggerated claims and untrue reports about its performance made by high officials of the Government. The production of the motor has been delayed in a useless and unnecessary manner and the details of its design can not be considered to be definitely established even now.

From all information available, it appears further that while the low-compression, low-altitude type may be considered as being developed to such an extent that with proper effort it could be turned over to standardized production in a few weeks, the development of the more important high-altitude type is still in its infancy. It is progressing at a discouragingly slow rate, mainly because, to conceal the exaggerations made in the early reports, the officials concerned therein do not dare to stage the present true situation and thereby to secure the cooperation of men who could be of service.

(9) On the whole, it appears that less than 5 per cent of the production facilities of the country are utilized, and those facilities which are utilized have been in many cases neither properly selected nor handled in a manner conducive to the highest efficiency of production.

In submitting this report the committee desires to present the following additional information:

It has started the work with the desire to be of service to the Government and believes that in submitting what is mainly a critical document it still continues in its original line of work.

In its investigation the committee did not try to determine or fix any personal responsibilities. Neither has it concerned itself with questions of cost or profits, and when it ran across any evidence bearing on these matters it deliberately and consistently rejected it in the conviction that the Aeronautical Society of America is mainly an engineering body and should limit itself to the consideration of engineering and production features.

OFFICIAL PUBLICITY.

The committee at an early stage of its investigations became convinced, as has been since proven to a certain extent officially, that the majority of the statements issued by the Government in connection with the execution of the aeronautical program are untrustworthy.

The following statements appear to offend worst in the matter of truth speaking:

In the Official Bulletin of September 13, 1917, appeared the famous statement of Secretary Baker, giving the history of the Liberty motor.

This statement begins: "The United States aviation engine has passed its final test." This statement is unqualifiedly untrue. According to the statement of Maj. J. G. Vincent at the annual meeting of the Society of Locomotive Engineers, in December, 1917, the only test that was apparently given to the engine at that time was a 50-hour test not at maximum horsepower. It is ridiculous to call such a test final. In fact, it is doubtful if a final test has been given to the engine even now, in April, 1918.

In the same statement it is said that "tools for building the first engine were made even before the drawings were finished, on the assumption that they would be correct." It is absolutely impossible that this should be true, as before the tools can be made the dimensions of the parts have to be known.

The statement proceeds: "Thirty days after the assembling of the first engine preliminary test justified the Government in formally accepting the engine as the best aircraft engine produced in any country. The final test confirmed our faith in the new motor in every degree." Here again Secretary Baker speaks about the final test. Here is, however, chronology. The engine was set up for the first time on July 3. The preliminary tests were made 30 days thereafter, or about August 2, at which time only one unit was built. It would appear, therefore, that the engine was developed to the final stage in about 40 days more and given the final test. We know, however, that this is untrue, because the engine is barely in the final stage even now.

The next statement which contains inaccuracies of a still graver character has been issued by the Secretary of War in October, 1917. At that time it was stated that "work is in progress on practically the entire number of aeroplanes and motors for which provision was made in the aviation bill passed by Congress in July." As a matter of fact, at that time practically no work was in progress on the manufacture of machines. In many cases the buildings in which the machines were to be manufactured were not yet built.

"The types of aeroplanes now in process of manufacture cover the entire range of training planes, light high-speed fighting machines, and powerful battle and bombing planes of the heaviest design"—again untrue, because at that time neither the light high-speed fighting machines nor the battle and bombing planes were in the process of manufacture. In fact, according to a statement made to the directors of this society by Mr. Coffin, no light high-speed fighting machines have been or are to be manufactured in this country at any time.

On January 29 and 30 Col. Deeds, in testifying before the Senate Military Affairs Committee on the aeronautical situation, stated, according to the nearest report of the hearing as published in the New York Tribune, that "the machines now being manufactured and sent to France not only would meet present requirements but would excel anything the enemy may produce in some time to come." At that time no fighting machines were sent to France.

It was also stated that "80,000 aviators, trained or nearly trained, were available for the American aircraft fleet"—Motor Age, January, 1917. This statement is untrue and ridiculous on its face, as actually less than one-tenth of this number is available.

On February 20, 1918, an Associated Press dispatch stated that "control of the air in the American sector belongs to the enemy." On the same date, obviously to counteract the impression produced by the press dispatch, was published a statement authorized by the Secretary of War "in order to give as complete a picture as is permissible under military requirements of the problem and the progress in equipping the air service with fighting planes."

The picture is so complete that one can not help seeing in it things that are not in the original landscape. "The first American-built battle planes are to-day en route to the front in France. This first shipment, though in itself not large, marks the final overcoming of many difficulties met in building up this new and intricate industry." This statement would be plainer to the ordinary man if it were frankly stated that only two machines were en route.

"These planes are equipped with the first Liberty motor from machine production. One of them in a recent test surpassed all records for speed and climbing for planes of that type." The committee hesitates to state what it thinks about this statement, because it does not know whether it was simply invented in the office of the Secretary of War or elsewhere, or whether it was based on an actual engineering report. In view of the fact that several weeks after the shipment of these planes such a vital feature of construction as the lubrication system of the Liberty motor has been found to be unsatisfactory, the talk about breaking a record sounds discouraging. If it was invented by the writer of the statement, it is only one of the many misstatements clogging the aeronautical program. If it is based on a report of the engineers, an investigation is most respectfully suggested, and the committee ventures to add that drastic action would be taken against any engineers submitting as misleading a report in private business.

"The great problem now remaining is to secure the thousands of skilled mechanics, enginemen, motor repair men, wood and metal workers, etc., needed to keep the planes always in perfect condition." The War Department has apparently found a way of securing these men by machine production. It does not appear how they can be secured otherwise, because the committee understands that the various recruiting aeronautical officers have been instructed to discontinue the acceptance of men for the nonflying services.

"Now that American battle planes are going overseas a great increase in the volunteering of skilled mechanics is both essential and expected." The country never failed to give the men, the need for which is essential. The War Department fails to make them welcome.

Just to indicate what a misleading impression is being created not only in the general public but even in technical circles most closely allied with the execution of the aeronautical program, the committee begs to quote two statements from editorials in the Automotive Industries, a leading automobile trade paper.

On March 14, 1918, page 559, the editorial states: "The aeroplane schedule is up to date." On March 21, 1918, on page 607, the editorial states, "That the production program is behind schedule is a matter of regret." If a person as closely allied with the industry and as skilled in the art as the editor of the Automotive Industries was deceived to such an extent as to make one week a statement which he had to acknowledge as being untrue the next week, it shows the grave results of the policy of untruth and misstatement of the various officers connected with the execution of our aeronautical program.

The committee has never known an engineering undertaking to succeed by means of untruthful advertising, and it does not believe that in this instance misstatements have been or will be of any service in arousing the patriotic spirit of the country. In fact it grieves to think that there were high officials in the Government who thought that the American people need to be fooled into fighting for their country. The spirit of the people in the draft, in the loans, and in the volunteering has shown that this is entirely unnecessary. The Government's publicity campaign had one result which was neither desired nor desirable.

According to Reuter's Agency the French general staff has in its possession proofs that the Germans, spurred to greater effort by the fear of American achievement, have vastly increased their aerial forces. Some 400 furniture, woodworking, and piano factories have been converted to the new uses; the Fokker Co. has taken over the great Berzina piano factory, near Schwerin, and large orders for parts were placed in Switzerland. The production in Germany has reached 700 to 1,000 planes a week and is growing. The "American danger" has been also referred to on several occasions in German general staff orders.

This would have been bad enough if the American planes were there, but they are not.

CENSORSHIP.

An extremely rigorous censorship over all matters connected with the execution of the aircraft problem has been maintained from the beginning, to such an extent that, for example, for several weeks after the issue of the Secretary of War's statement about the Liberty motor the papers were not allowed to mention the names of the designers of the motor, Messrs. Vincent and Hall.

In the majority of cases this censorship had no military value whatsoever, but materially interfered with production.

To cite an example, the Liberty motor. The original statement about the motor was issued in September, but nobody was allowed to know any details of construction. About six weeks later a brief notice in the engineering periodical Power gave a few details about the construction, enough to recognize the type but not enough to be of any other use. Then, in the early part of December, Maj. J. G. Vincent presented a paper before the Society of Automotive Engineers, which gave sufficient data for the enemy to recognize the vital features of the design of the engine, but not enough for American engineers to be of service to the Government. Since then little items of information filtered through here and there, mainly indicating various teething troubles in the growth of the motor.

This brief sequence leads to the following conclusion:

In the first place, if the information contained in Maj. Vincent's paper was permissible for publication in December, there was no reason—except political overadvertising—why it should not have been published in the early part of September, when the benefits of two months of criticism would have been secured by the designers.

In the second place, there is no reason whatsoever why the Liberty motor, as a whole, should be considered secret and confidential even now. So many units have been built in factories where there are supposed to be about 1 spy to every 15 or 20 workers—according to Senator OVERMAN—that there is no doubt that the enemy knows, or can know, every one of the details of construction. If, however, an American engineer went to the Signal Corps and asked to see the motor, so as to offer his suggestions, he would be probably thrown out of the room.

The result of this has been quite disastrous. The tooling up of the motor has been delayed partly because the designers of the motor were not machine-shop men. There have been several troubles, such as ignition in the high-altitude type, cooling, lubrication, which could have been avoided if advice were early sought or welcomed.

There is no reason whatsoever why, in the case of a national production like the Liberty motor, a few units, in which the really secret parts had been substituted, could not have been set up in Washington, Detroit, New York, and Chicago in such a manner as to be accessible for inspection by properly accredited engineers whose loyalty is beyond suspicion. In this way the cooperation of the country would have been secured and delays in production avoided.

There are even now in the Liberty motor features which would not stand the open criticism of American engineers, but this criticism is stifled—to whose benefit?—by the fact that nobody but those who can be "politically trusted" are permitted to see the motor.

At the annual meeting of the Society of Automotive Engineers Maj. J. G. Vincent stated that "we have something up our sleeves." If anything but cuffs was up their sleeves, the best thing was to keep silent about it. The Aeronautical Society of America is vigorously in favor of maintaining the strictest secrecy about any real engineering progress or useful inventions made in this country, and unqualifiedly indorses all legislation proposed for the suppression of spies. It believes that such legislation is most urgently needed, provided, however, antispy and censorship measures are not used to cover the incompetence of officials.

ACCIDENTS IN TRAINING.

If the number of accidents in training has been published completely and correctly, it can not be considered as being excessive. Unfortunately, however, there is a growing conviction that at least some of the accidents could have been prevented.

In the published reports of accidents the causes are stated only very briefly and sometimes quite unintelligibly. Nevertheless two classes of accidents appear to have been of the type which should form a subject of the most rigorous investigation.

There were several collisions in the air. Now, there is far less reason and justification for a collision in the air on the training field than for a train collision on a railroad. With the whole State of Texas to fly in, a territory about the size of France and Belgium together, and only a few hundred men to take the air, there is absolutely no justification for the failure to prepare such a schedule that the men who are up in the air at the same time should be at least 20 miles away from each other. Apparently no such schedule has been prepared, and men were allowed to fly at their sweet will. Considering the fact that men in the early stages of training are not properly equipped for gauging distances or the speed of their flight, the absence of a flying schedule practically invited accidents. If such accidents happened in a flying school in civil life the men in charge would have been indicted for homicide.

The second group of accidents is very deplorable from another point of view. This refers to accidents due to the ignition of the tanks. There is no reason whatsoever why a tank in a training machine should get on fire. In a fighting machine which may be up in the air for very long periods under all sorts of conditions, with an engine sometimes running above critical speed, the vibrations and strains on the structure may be such as to cause leaks. A training machine goes up in the air for limited periods of time, with the engine running considerably below full output, and flies at fairly low speed. Besides, the training machine practically never goes up when the weather is very rough. Hence, the training machine is never subjected to such legitimate strains as would cause leaks of tanks with consequent ignition of the gasoline. The only reason why such things can occur is either defective construction of the machine or defective system of inspection and maintenance of machines between flights. Every case of ignition of a tank on a training machine in the present state of engineering, shows a crime on somebody's part, and every young man who loses his life from this cause has been murdered. It is an unpleasant thing to say, but that is what it amounts to.

That the acceptance and inspection of the apparatus on the flying fields is not up to a high mark of efficiency is shown, for example, by the significant case of the goggles for fliers. It is a fact that defective goggles have been accepted and extensively used, the goggles being equipped with such glasses that when an aviator at landing thought that he was at the height of about 50 feet above the ground, he was actually up not more than 10 feet, this resulting in several accidents and in a good many cases excessively heavy bumping of machines at landing. Unless the goggles were accepted without any testing whatsoever, which would be a very startling case, the committee fails to see how the inspectors in charge of acceptance failed to notice such an obvious defect, and if such a defect has remained unnoticed, who knows how many more are there lurking unknown and threatening the lives of our young men.

These accidents indicate that the training system requires tightening up and more systematic organization.

RECRUITING.

The recruiting of men both for the flying and nonflying services has been started with the big brass band, only to be practically entirely discontinued in the last few weeks. The actual recruiting for the flying sections has been entirely discontinued, even examinations being suspended; for the nonflying sections, the recruiting has been discontinued in the East, but a limited number of men are still being taken in in the Middle West.

When asked about it, officials of the Signal Corps stated that "there is no lack of human aviation material, no matter if fit boys do go to other arms of war service." This is a plain case of careless ignorance of the problem before us, which shows that the men in charge of American aviation have failed to learn from European experience.

The best flying material is furnished by young men between 21 and 25. The June, 1917, registration showed approximately ten and a half million men in the ages between 21 and 31. Hence, roughly four and a half million men would fall within the limits 21 to 25. Of these four and a half million, roughly 25 per cent have to be eliminated as covering aliens and colored men, who could not be considered for the service. This leaves 3,375,000 men. As about one man in a hundred makes really good material for the Aircraft Service flying branch, this would indicate that we have roughly about 40,000 men available. Perhaps 10,000 more could be secured by lowering the age limit to 19 years, which would be advisable anyhow. Still, going by averages, we have only 50,000 men. Of course, this is more than sufficient for the number of planes which the present aircraft administration can produce, but it is entirely insufficient for the number which this country may need if the war is carried into 1919.

It is by no means exaggerated to expect that between 75,000 and 80,000 machines with the American star may have to be delivered to the European front by the middle of 1919, if we want to smash the Hun. (The aircraft authorities may say that this can not be done. It is, however, an old story that the men who can not do a thing say that it can not be done. Why not let somebody try who thinks that it can be done?) If 75,000 or 80,000 machines have to be delivered, that will mean 150,000 men, which again will mean that even a country with the best human resources in the world practically untouched, may have to strain its resources to the utmost and perhaps use the second best material to meet the most urgent situation that human history has seen.

Under these conditions, to lose deliberately excellent material through the failure of simply going through the process of induction into service is a shortsightedness which borders on plain madness on one side and treasonable cleverness on the other side. Every man fit for the Aviation Service who is driven into any other service is an ineradicable blot on the record of the present aircraft administration.

It may be reasonably asked what can be done if there are not sufficient facilities for training all the men available. Such a question would simply indicate lack of understanding of what the modern aviator's training consists. A good aviator to-day must be not only a good flier but also a good signaler and a good wireless man. He must know the rudiments of artillery firing. He must have experience in observation. If he is a map sketcher, he is all the more valuable. A good knowledge of photography is of great value. All these branches are usually somewhat slighted because of the necessity of rushing the man through the schools as fast as possible. This haste in training was justified in England and France, where the need for aviators was tremendous and the number of men not large enough to pass the school facilities.

We in America have more men than training-camp facilities. We have therefore no need to rush through the training in the auxiliary branches. We can train our men so as to produce at least 300 per cent better men than either England or France have ever been able to produce, and we are not doing it, exclusively because everybody seems to think that we must copy every mistake and every defect of the foreign systems. Americans have never been so slavishly subservient to foreign examples, and they are not in other branches of military training. There seems to be some kind of a fog around the whole aviation program which precludes the men in charge from seeing either the great resources, human and material, of our country, or the ultimate aim of our program, and our boys will pay for this by their lives.

RESEARCH AND INVENTION.

The art of aviation is tremendously new, and the efficiency of the engine, plane, and accesories is comparatively low. In fact, it would not be an exaggeration to say that the over-all efficiency of the aeroplane as a whole is hardly more than 3 per cent.

It is because of these facts that research and invention play an unusually important part in the development of aeronautics. The enemy is hard at it and is doing his best all the time to produce bigger, better, and faster planes. It is very fortunate for the cause of the allies that the fine work of British and French designers has been able to keep up with that of the enemy, so that on the whole the air supremacy has been either undecided or, except for brief periods, with the allies.

When America entered into the struggle the world had a right to expect that a new era has begun for aeronautical developments. The aeroplane is an American invention. So is the flying boat and the hydroneroplane.

In numberless other lines American engineers have led the world by their ingenuity and boldness of engineering achievements. The best machine-shop men, the best makers of automatic machinery, the biggest makers of automobile engines are in America. Further, for three years, while the world was on fire, America at peace had time to prepare itself.

This matter of invention and research is of far greater importance than mere sentiment or advertising. One thousand bigger and better machines than any now available at the front would be more valuable than 5,000 machines of the usual size and capacity and than 10,000 machines of inferior speed or carrying ability. The inventor's work is therefore at least as important, if not more so, than that of the production engineer.

It is perhaps more than anything unfortunate that apparently the leaders in the execution of our aeronautical program failed to realize this basic condition, which has been probably due to the fact that they are not aeronautical engineers and have no first-hand knowledge of the development of the art, and the present situation at the front. For men who are entirely unfamiliar with the art, it seemed to be the safest course to pursue, to move along the ruts broken by those who went ahead. In fact, the Secretary of War, in his statement giving the history of the Liberty motor, announced with apparent pride that the designing engineers were instructed not to use any but fully tried-out constructions. If a man started to design a racing car under such orders it would be a safe bet that his car would not be in the first three at the finish.

The actual situation in connection with research and invention is as follows:

The entire matter is in the hands partly of the Signal Corps and partly of the national advisory committee for aeronautics. The Signal Corps has somewhat over $2,000,000 available for this purpose, and is doing some useful work at the McCook field at Dayton, Ohio, where this work is in charge of Maj. J. G. Vincent. The work done is of a very high grade, indeed, but the facilities available and the number of men employed are entirely inadequate for the tremendous program of this country, and the multiplication of the work done there by 20 would be barely sufficient.

Likewise a good deal of work is being done at the Bureau of Standards, chiefly in connection with the development of the Liberty motor. Here, again, the work done is of the highest grade. It is under the direction of Dr. S. W. Stratton and in personal charge of Dr. C. H. Dickinson. The staff is small; the facilities limited to such an extent that only work of the most vital importance in connection with the current program can be carried out, and even this restricted program is put through only at the cost of working the men and apparatus to their utmost capacity; there are no union hours at the Bureau of Standards.

The national advisory committee is supposed to take charge of new inventions in aeronautics, and in fact has several times issued appeals to have such inventions submitted to it. It was organized long before the United States entered into the war, and consists of a few men who have many other and onerous duties to perform. Practically all the members of the committee are men only indirectly familiar with aeronautics. The committee has no laboratory facilities at its command for testing out inventions; no shops, no organized technical staff for their consideration, so that, to all practical purposes, the submission of a serious invention to the committee results simply in loss of time, both to the inventor and the members of the committee. To all practical purposes the committee is nothing but an office for the filing away of descriptions of inventions, and one can not help thinking that the most honest thing that the committee could do would be to tell the truth and thus forestall the loss of time and money by inventors who communicate with it. The appropriation asked by the committee for the next year is only $260,000, an amount ridiculously small for an organization taking charge of inventions for a program which may easily run into several billions of dollars. Private concerns, like the General Electric Co., have been known to spend several times this amount on a single research.

The only proper thing to do would be to reorganize the committee into a modern, adequate body, with ample laboratory facilities and a staff of men who would devote their entire time to the consideration of new inventions. An adequate appropriation, something like $25,000,000, should be granted to the committee, and the work placed in charge of a man of the type of Dr. Whitney, of the General Electric Co., not necessarily an aeronautical man, as such may not be available, but a man accustomed to research in its broad aspects on a large scale.

STANDARDIZATION AND PRODUCTION.

The execution of the aeronautical program was from the beginning largely in charge of automobile engineers, and to a certain extent under the influence of the Society of Automotive Engineers. One of the tenets of the automobile engineer's gospel is standardization, which means adoption of such a type of construction that, as far as possible, only elements of certain accepted shapes, types, and dimensions should be used.

In view of American methods of production, which are based on the maximum use of automatic machinery and minimum use of skilled labor, a certain amount of standardization was inevitable if results were to be achieved. A reasonably large degree of standardization was advisable, and even a slight excess of standardization might have been condoned, provided it would lead to quick results.

There are certain dangers in overstandardization of such rapidly changing structures as aeroplanes, because standardization may easily stand in the way of progress. In fact, the committee understands that in the latter part of 1917 the British Air Board called the attention of the American authorities to these dangers.

The investigating committee does not deem it advisable to enter here into a discussion of whether standardization in the exercise of the American aeronautical program has been carried beyond reasonable limits, as this is largely a matter of opinion. What the committee desires to emphasize, however, is that the benefits of standardization have been lost through lack of coordination between the engineering, procurement, and production departments.

The main reason for standardization is that standardized parts can be manufactured by concerns best equipped to do it. Therefore parts of planes and engines can be manufactured all over the country and then easily assembled, and in this way the total production capacity of the country can be easily utilized.

We see, however, that actually the Signal Corps in the manufacture of aeroplanes and parts has 65 contractors and 400 subcontractors. Now, the use of subcontractors is radically opposed to the very spirit of standardized production. If the subcontractor makes a bolt, a nut, or a turnbuckle of standardized design for the Curtiss Co., there is no reason why it should not make the same piece of apparatus for any other company in the field; and if so, there is no reason why the concern should act as a subcontractor and not as a direct contractor.

Subcontractors are used either when the original employer, in this case the Government, does not know where to find them and is willing to pay a brokerage fee to the contractor for the information. It would be a shame if this were the case here.

Another reason for using subcontractors is when the product is such that only one particular contractor uses it, but this is opposed to the principle of standardization.

The third reason for using subcontractors is to increase the profits of the contractor at the cost of the subcontractor. The committee can not believe that this has been the reason in the present instance, but failing all these three causes it does not see why any subcontractors should have been used.

The concentration of the entire production in the hands of such a limited number of concerns as the original fortunate 65 contractors could have been easily carried out even without resorting to the principle of standardization. It led, however, to a tremendous delay in production, because of the limited productive facilities of these 65 concerns, some of which at the time when they received the contracts had no facilities except financial and political connections.

The small plants have not been utilized. In fact, the Council of National Defense in its report for the first year explained that this was its fixed policy, due to the fact that accountants had to be put into plants where the work was done on a cost-plus basis, and that the limited number of accountants made it impossible to use the smaller plants. The investigating committee wonders if Pershing's men will be satisfied, when the planes fail to materialize, to be told that the planes did not come because there were not enough accountants to make reports to the Council of National Defense.

As a matter of fact, with standardized production and a reasonable desire to get results, there was nothing simpler than to permit the smaller plants to produce parts at a fixed price, with bonuses for early deliveries and penalties for delays. To take the wooden parts as an example, struts for aeroplanes could be produced in about 5,000 plants of cabinetmakers, furniture makers, piano factories, toy makers, and so forth, at the rate of about 2,000,000 a day, which would be many times more than is necessary for the needs of the American aviation. At the present time they are producing at the rate many times less than is necessary. These contractors can work under a standard contract at so much per piece, with standard bonuses and penalties. There would be no hundred million dollar contracts, no pomp and glory in Washington, but achieved results.

The same applies to everything from beginning to end. The productive capacity of the country is utilized to probably not more than 5 per cent, because apparently the ability to produce goods urgently needed is by no means a sufficient consideration for securing a contract.

The investigating committee has found that in some cases a brokerage commission—to give it the real name—is to be paid to a favored company by those who desire to get work.

Thus there have been before the United States entered into the war several small aeroplane companies who have been doing very fine work on a small scale. When the United States entered the war these companies offered their facilities to the Government. The investigating committee knows of cases where such companies were told that they could work only as subcontractors to the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, and when they went to the Curtiss Co. they were told that they could secure such contracts only by paying the Curtiss Co. a commission somewhat in excess of 1 per cent, and further by recognizing the validity of the Curtiss patents, some of which are now under litigation and some others not considered as valid by American builders. Mr. Howard E. Coffin was asked by the directors of the society to explain why a company could make planes as subcontractors to the Curtiss Co. but not as a direct contractor to the United States Government. Mr. Coffin startled the directors of the society by declaring that he was entirely ignorant of the existence of such a situation, and that in fact the Aircraft Board did not even possess a list of such companies. The investigating committee believes that this indicates utter ignorance of the manufacturing resources of the country on the part of an institution of which the only excuse for existence is its ability to advise the Government about such resources.

PRODUCTION.

That there have been great delays in production has been vigorously denied only about three weeks ago. In fact, there was a tendency to brand as pro-German propaganda all assertions that there have been delays. Of late, however, the pitiless logic of facts forced the War Department to concede a delay at the rate of about 60 to 90 days, resulting in the fact that instead of thousands of planes being delivered to France by July 1, only the pitifully ridiculous number of 37 planes might be so delivered—sufficient for about six hours of fighting at the present rate. Some of the causes of these delays are of a justifiable nature.

There have been changes in the program during the year, due, however, very largely to the fact that the original program was drawn up by men who knew next to nothing about either the art of flying or the production of flying machines.

There have been delays due to enemy interference in the plants, which latter were also hampered by lack of laws to combat such interference. This should be corrected at the earliest opportunity, but the results of spy activities in the past should not be exaggerated. In fact, such a statement as that of Senator OVERMAN to the effect that substitution of lead in a piece of tubing on a Bristol machine delayed production for two months, shows rather a lack of understanding of engineering production on a large scale. It certainly did not need two months in a decently organized, big plant to change a piece of piping or a bracket on a machine.

Finally, labor troubles were several times mentioned as having delayed the delivery of essential materials, such as spruce. This, again, should not be exaggerated, as a Senator stated from the floor of the Senate that he offered to the Government on behalf of some of his constituents to deliver all the spruce necessary, and that this offer has been neglected.

There have been other causes of delay, however, for which the investigating committee can find no justification whatsoever.

The diplomatic relations with Germany were broken on February 4, 1917. War was declared on April 6, but the first meeting of the engineers to discuss the Liberty motor did not take place until June 3, or nearly two months after war was declared. What justification was there for delaying so much this most vital feature of the work? Funds were available, as at that time more than half of the hundred million dollar emergency fund at the disposition of the President could be used for this purpose.

Other delays were due to the very inadequate system of contracting for the production of planes and engines. Practically all the contracts are made on a cost-plus basis, without any bonus for early production or any penalty for late production. The whole matter is therefore left to the discretion or patriotism of the producing companies, a pitifully inadequate system in a matter of such vital importance. Certainly none of the engineers of the Aircraft Board or Signal Corps has, or ever would, stake the welfare of his private business on such a contract, but evidently what was not good in "real business" was good enough where only the lives of the men in our armies depended on the timely production of aircraft.

A still worse feature was that even after the contracts were signed, apparently little effort was made to help the contractors to get along with their work.

Thus, the first five-day suspension of fuel utilization—Garfield order—did not exclude aeroplane factories.

In other cases production was retarded by inconsequential changes of design. Cases have become public where blue prints were recalled and work delayed in order to make changes of a most puerile nature.

There were still worse cases where blue prints sent from the Signal Corps failed to reach manufacturers because proper precautions were not taken for their delivery, and because there was no proper system of checking the movement of documents of such importance. A rather startling fact has been disclosed by a director of the Curtiss Co., which, if true, would indicate an absolute absence of any kind of organization in the Signal Corps. This gentleman has stated in the public press that the Curtiss Co. has delayed the delivery of bombing planes because until the end of March, 1918, the Signal Corps failed to adopt a type of bombing attachment. If true, this would be equivalent to saying that the Army can not be sent to Europe because the Government has not yet decided on the rifles it is going to use. The investigating committee leaves the responsibility for this fact on the source from which it was taken, as the fact is too startlingly horrible to be accepted as true without further proof; but, if true, it is certainly time that something should be done about it.

LIBERTY MOTOR.

The investigating committee has found a very surprising situation with respect to the Liberty motor. The true story of the Liberty motor is one of which the country may well be proud. Instead of this a fairy tale, untrue, boastful, full of flamboyant statements, sometimes written with ridiculous ignorance of elementary engineering, has been told. The effect of this was that a considerable uneasiness and suspicion has been created about this motor in the minds of the people, the fault for which rests entirely and exclusively with the publicity campaign of the aircraft officialdom.

In fact, it would be no exaggeration to say that if a private company advertised a motor for the purpose of selling stock by statements similar to those used with respect to the Liberty motor it would have been long ago criminally indicted.

The committee desires to state the true facts, in the belief that the actual story of the Liberty motor is one that the country is entitled to know and of which it has a right to be proud.

Long before the war started, when only the most far-sighted and patriotic men in the country saw that the United States should get ready for emergencies, the leaders of the Packard Co., President C. B. Joy and Vice President Jesse G. Vincent, had decided to do by their individual efforts what the United States failed to do officially.

The Packard Co., while highly successful as a business enterprise, is really neither very large nor very wealthy, and an expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars, which work of this nature required, practically without any hope of financial returns, was a sacrifice of no mean magnitude. Nevertheless, the company patriotically decided to do it, with the result that when this country entered the war and the Government was looking for an aeroplane engine there were two years of high-grade experimental work available for the country to make use of.

For patriotic reasons the Packard Co. went even so far as to merge its name in the general name, Liberty motor, thus sacrificing all possible advertising value for its achievement. The company did not ask or ever receive a single cent in royalties or as compensation for the work done, and has given up one of its most valuable men, now Maj. J. G. Vincent, to the Government for the time of the war.

The Liberty motor represents in the first place the result of these two years of experimentation, and further the additional work put into it by a number of engineers who, while not specialists in aeronautical motors—this applies at least to the majority—have done in the past splendid work in the development and production of the high-speed gasoline engine generally. The motor is, therefore, basically without doubt an excellent motor, but it is not the best motor that the country could have produced, and is not yet really the motor which it is safe to use on the front.

The curse on the production of the motor has been the excessive secrecy needed to make possible its overadvertising. At the early stage of the production of the motor machine-shop men were not allowed to see it or to help on it. The result of this was that certain constructions were adopted which had to be changed when the question of tooling came up.

Only a few favored engineers were allowed to take part in the development of the motor, and the development itself went in ways quite unusual for an undertaking of this importance. To cite but an instance: It was only in February, 1918, or eight months after the beginning of the work, that an advisory committee consisting of two specialists, Messrs. H. M. Crane and D. McCall White, has been formed. There was no reason why such an advisory committee, consisting of perhaps 15 or 20 men, should not have been formed from the beginning, as it certainly would have been able to help in production.

In other instances where there was a divergence of opinion as to certain principles of design a course was followed unjustifiable in an undertaking so vitally important to the defense of the country as the Liberty motor. To cite an instance: It was somewhere about September, 1917, that a divergence of opinion arose as to lubrication of the motor. If a commercial company had staked a year's production and several hundred million dollars on a design of a motor, it would have gone ahead and built all types until destructive tests have shown which is the right one. Messrs. Coffin, Vincent, Deeds, and the rest of them can easily find instances in the records of the companies with which they were connected before entering into the service of the country where just such a course has been followed. But in the case of the Liberty motor it has not been found until comparatively recently that changes in the lubrication system have to be made.

According to a statement by Judson C. Welliver, Washington staff correspondent of the New York Globe (Globe, Mar. 29, 1918), "The Senate committee has elicited from notes to willing witnesses the admission that so recently as two weeks ago the whole oiling system of the motor has been changed." From this newspaper report it appears that a motor expert explained to the committee that there was nothing wrong with the oiling system of the Liberty motor. The difficulty was that the crank shaft was proper for a 4-cylinder engine, but used on a 12-cylinder one.

If this is true, we find here an instance where a mistake was made of so glaring a character as would have been absolutely impossible in the face of open criticism.

"Pitiless publicity" has been found an excellent remedy for rotten politics. It is as good a remedy for poor engineering, perhaps even a better one.

There is one feature about the Liberty motor which the committee desires to bring out most clearly. There has been a statement recently made, on authority not known to the committee, in the Philadelphia Public Ledger to the effect that the Liberty motor, speaking colloquially, is a hog on gasoline. In fact, the Public Ledger goes so far as to say that it consumes more than 100 per cent gasoline as compared with the British Sunbeam motor.

The committee has no data which would either confirm or disprove this very startling and vitally important revelation. It regrets to say, however, that it is inclined to believe that there is an element of truth in this assertion. In the first place, all official statements mention the great speed with which the motor was designed and the records which planes equipped with the motor have made in the air, but it nowhere says a single word as to the gasoline and oil consumption.

It is also very significant that in the paper of Maj. J. G. Vincent, as published in the Journal of the Society of Automotive Engineers for January, 1918, a lot of details are given about the motor and not a word is said about fuel and oil consumption.

The Packard Twin Six, which is undoubtedly a very fine engine in many respects, is not known as being economical on gasoline consumption, and is not claimed to be so. It is hardly necessary to say that if the Liberty motor has an excessive fuel consumption (let us hope that this is not true), the utmost efforts ought to be immediately applied to see that something should be done about it. It is particularly important to determine what this excessive consumption is due to and whether it is any leak of gasoline into the crank case, as this would eliminate the motor for purposes of long-distance flying, the only purpose for which it is good.

Another point which has to be considered in connection with the Liberty motor is the state of development of the high-altitude type, which apparently has not progressed as far as it ought to. This, however, is a matter which can not be discussed in detail in a report of a nonconfidential character.

Before the investigating committee leaves the subject of the Liberty motor it desires to emphasize most strongly the fact that, to the best of its knowledge, all persons concerned in its design, and in particular the Packard Co. before the war, the Bureau of Standards, and Maj. Vincent's organization since the beginning of the war, have done work of which both they and the country may be justly proud, work which represents the highest class of effort, worthy of the patriotism and genius of America. If the results are not what they might have been it was practically exclusively due to the fact that the organization which handled this matter was small, inadequate, bound by red tape, hampered by improper publicity, and fettered by secrecy, which was probably more unwelcome to the engineers directly in charge of the work than to anybody else.

As everywhere in the execution of the aeronautical program, here also the committee found the best of spirit, tireless effort, absolute lack of selfishness, and the highest devotion on the lower rungs of the service, and it was only when the investigation touched the tops of the service that lack of system, lack of knowledge of the subject, and absolute absence of all coordination of effort and worse became apparent.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, the investigating committee desires to report most respectfully that it has found a situation fraught with the gravest danger.

It has found throughout the planning of the aeronautical program an entirely un-American spirit of boastfulness, willingness to tell things as they are not, lack of system, fear of tackling a big subject in a really big way.

In a country which built the Panama Canal, the tremendous transcontinental system, the greatest subway systems in the world, which found new ways for the transmission of electrical energy, where a fifty or hundred million dollar undertaking in private life finds barely a mention on the inside pages of a newspaper, the execution of the aeronautical program was handled in the way of a wildcat stock-selling campaign.

It is useless to say that this kind of overadvertising (to use the mild official name for it) had nothing to do with the actual exercise of the program. It is a human experience that the man who is willing to tell an untruth about his work only very seldom is capable of doing the highest grade of work. The men by whose work the world moves ahead only in the rarest instances are willing to tell fully what they are doing, and never demean themselves to claim what they have not done.

Real achievement does not need fake advertising, and where there is fake advertising it is usually idle to look for great achievement.

The aeronautical program and its execution must be reorganized from top to bottom, especially at the top.

The tendency of war is to require equipment on an unprecedented scale. It is the belief of your committee that the development of aeronautical affairs is only at the beginning, and that this country may be called upon to contribute by this time, 1919, something like 75,000, perhaps 100,000, aeroplanes.

It would be idle to say that this can not be done. With full utilization of American resources five times this number can be produced without materially interfering with the other military activities of the country.

It would be likewise idle to say that this number of machines can not be transported because of lack of shipping. If it is found that its transportation is necessary to win the war it will be done, as the utilization of shipping for war purposes has by no means reached yet its climax. It would be correct to say that it would not be done with the present system, and that is why a change of system is most insistently urged.

L. CAMMEN, Chairman.
THOMAS A. HILL.
CHARLES W. HOWELL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That, Mr. President, I think is an expert report from a highly technical and skilled association of this country, composed of scientific men who know something about this business.

I should now like the Secretary to read the editorial contained in the same issue of the New York Times—that of yesterday—upon that report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 1, 1918.]

WHO IS GUILTY?

"In the Senate debate upon Mr. Gutzon Borglum's serious charges of waste, mismanagement, and inefficiency in aircraft production, published in the Times of Sunday, Senator HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, who is a member of the Military Affairs Committee, was asked if the letter written by the President authorizing Mr. Borglum to make his investigation had been recalled. He made this reply:

"'Not that I know of. I assume that Mr. Borglum has been unable to lay before the President any more definite information than that he was able to give me; and from my knowledge of the information the committee had already, I knew the material Mr. Borglum had would not be of any great value.'

"Will the matter end there? Congress has appropriated something like $1,000,000,000 of the people's money for the execution of the aircraft-production program. Senator HITCHCOCK himself declared during the debate 'that the aircraft program had failed and that only one American machine had been transported to the American Army in France.' We may assume that in this statement he meant that only one machine equipped with the Liberty motor had been shipped to France, for later he specifically made the statement in that form. One billion of dollars appropriated, a year of time lost, and the aircraft-production program has 'failed.'

"Will the Senate dismiss the matter on the strength of Mr. HITCHCOCK's opinion that the material supplied by Mr. Borglum 'would not be of any great value'? In the view of the Senate is it a matter of no consequence, quite immaterial, that Mr. Borglum has shown that the aircraft production has failed? What does Mr. HITCHCOCK, what does his committee, what does the Senate, expect of Mr. Borglum? That he should discover not only that the aircraft-production program has failed but that he should hunt down the causes of failure, disclose the delays, errors, blunders, or worse that have caused the failure, identify the guilty persons who are responsible for the squandering of $1,000,000,000 without results and bring them to the Senate committee room for examination?

"Those are not Mr. Borglum's functions as an investigator. He has brought to light the astonishing conditions that exist in the field of aircraft production, he has exposed the failure of the Aircraft Board and of the Signal Corps to construct airplanes. Is that 'material' of no value to the Senate? It is the Senate's business, the business of the Military Affairs Committee, to take up the investigation where Mr. Borglum necessarily laid it down and pursue the inquiry until responsibility for failure is fixed, until guilt is exposed, for unquestionably there is guilt here, and it must be personal. Why does the Senate hesitate? Why does it not at once order the Military Affairs Committee to begin an investigation?"

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have talked with Mr. Borglum this morning. I think he is perfectly reasonable in his view about this matter. I know there are certain gentlemen who have heard tales that he is engaged in some improper financial operation, and some people say he is crazy. I will take my chances on that. His sanity could be readily established, if it is questioned. Such charges as those ought not to go drifting about this country in responsible newspapers day after day. Now, I ask the Secretary to read what the New York Times says about the matter to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PHELAN. What is the regular order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is in the morning hour. The Chair is about to lay before the Senate certain messages, and then will come the order of petitions and memorials.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is a parliamentarian, and I will ask——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator from California that if he objects to this matter being now read, I will put it in later, when the conference report comes up, and will read it myself. It will, however, be better to have it in the RECORD connectedly. It will only take a few minutes, and I hope the Senator will not object. It is an important matter.

Mr. PHELAN. Since the Senator from Connecticut asks me not to do so, I will not object. I merely wish to recall the fact that I submitted an important official document a few days ago, and the Senator from Connecticut objected. I do not wish, however, to show the same spirit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator had requested me not to object, perhaps I should not have done so. I was then, however, very anxious to get at another matter.

Mr. PHELAN. I shall remember that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the editorial which is asked for by the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 2, 1918.]

A FEDERAL GRAND JURY FOR THE AIRPLANE INQUIRY.

"Secretary Baker did not willfully and intentionally deceive the public in the statements he made showing good progress in the execution of the airplane-production program. He was himself deceived, misled by persons who knew the facts, who knew that they were misleading the Secretary, who must have had a motive for deceiving him and the public. As the work of airplane production was carried on under the authority of the War Department, as these persons were under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War, it will be said that he should have acquainted himself with the facts at first hand, to tell the public only what he knew to be the truth. Whatever may be said or felt about that, no one will for a moment believe that the Secretary knowingly misrepresented the facts and attempted to make the public believe that airplane production was going on swimmingly when, in truth, it was not going on at all.

"The report of the investigating committee of the Aeronautical Society contrasts Mr. Baker's statements with actual conditions, which are very different from what he believed and represented them to be. In giving the history of the Liberty motor on September 13, 1917, Mr. Baker said that 'the United States aviation engine has passed its final test.' The committee declares that this was impossible; that, 'in fact, it is doubtful if a final test has been given to the engine even now, in April, 1918.' In a statement issued by Mr. Baker in October, 1917, it was declared 'that work is in progress on practically the entire number of airplanes and motors for which provision was made in the aviation bill passed by Congress in July.' The committee says that at that time 'practically no work was in progress in the manufacture of machines. In many cases the buildings in which the machines were to be manufactured were not yet built.' The Secretary further informed the public that 'the types of airplanes now in process of manufacture cover the entire range of training planes, light, high-speed fighting machines, and powerful battle and bombing planes of the heaviest design.' Yet Mr. Howard Coffin, of the Aircraft Board, informed the directors of the Aeronautical Society that 'no light, high-speed fighting machines have been or are to be manufactured in this country at any time,' nor were battle or bombing planes in process of manufacture at the date of the Secretary's statement. Again, on February 20, 1918, the Secretary authorized the statement that 'the first American-built airplanes are to-day en route to the battle fields in France. This first shipment, although itself not large, marks the final overcoming of the many difficulties in building up this new and intricate industry.' The committee says that at this time 'only two machines were en route.'

"The condition of affairs in the field of airplane production, then, is this: Congress appropriated $640,000,000 by the act of July last for the building of airplanes, including the necessary provision of material, tools, and machinery and for the establishment of training camps and the training of aviators. Subsequently other large sums were made available for these purposes. In April, 1918, it is disclosed by Mr. Borglum's investigation that the airplane-production program has 'failed,' that practically no airplanes have been produced. He tells of contracts awarded to persons who had no facilities for producing airplanes; of a vast plan, scheme, or conspiracy of profiteering; of prolonged, practically fruitless, and enormously expensive experimenting with the Liberty motor. At an earlier date than that of Mr. Borglum's statement, we had been told of unconscionable delays through endless changes in design and drawings furnished to the builders, many of them petty, unnecessary, productive only of delay. In an earlier report the Aeronautical Society had in part made disclosure of the conditions of delay, inefficiency, nonproduction, and failure now more fully brought to view by Mr. Borglum's statement and by its own more recent report. During all this time when airplanes were not being built, when the Liberty motor was not being brought to perfection and tested, when airplanes were not being sent to France in any numbers worthy of attention, when manufacturers held airplane contracts which they were without facilities to fulfill, yet when the money for airplane production was in the Treasury, appropriated by Congress, and was being spent upon this program of practically complete failure, the Secretary of War was induced or persuaded by certain persons as yet unknown to the public, although necessarily known to him, to put forth statements intended to make the people of the United States believe that their money was being spent to good purpose, that airplanes were being produced in quantity, that our soldiers at the front would soon be provided with this essential arm of the service.

"These conditions plainly point to an organized conspiracy, bold, powerful, numerous, made up of men able to formulate a great and definite plan and embracing within their number men sufficiently high placed and influential to have the ear and the confidence of the Secretary of War."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think that I ought to interrupt at this point to say that the recitals in Secretary Baker's announcement of February 20 or 21 were largely in accordance with the statements which had been made to the Committee on Military Affairs up to that time. The discoveries of that committee as to the actual conditions occurred subsequently to the date of that letter, and, presumably, the sources of the Secretary's information were from the same gentlemen connected with the aviation production who appeared and testified before our committee.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the editorial, as follows:

"It must have been these high-placed men who put before Mr. Baker the false picture of the work and achievements of the Aircraft Board and of the Signal Corps upon which he based his public statements. Necessarily the conspirators had a purpose, they had a motive, in deceiving the Secretary. Putting aside for a moment the question of their chief aim and purpose, what was their motive in deceiving the Secretary? Did they hope thus to cover up their record of failure? That would have been a mere postponement and a short one, for detection could not long be deferred. Was it their expectation that by misleading the Secretary and the people they could conceal their failure to produce airplanes for a time until they had pocketed the gains of their profiteering contracts? If this was their motive, it is necessary to assume that they expected the Government to pay them before the Government had received any airplanes from them.

"The motive is hard to discover until we get at the real purpose of the conspiracy. Was it, after all, nothing but a sordid venture in profiteering? If so, these airplane contractors stand practically alone among the great industrial producers of the country, who, as we know from innumerable examples, have been actuated first of all by a loyal desire to serve the Government, to help the Government in the prosecution of the war, putting their own profits in the second place. It is equally difficult to believe that a "ring" of inventors and patentees of airplanes and airplane devices, actuated by desire to confine the Government orders to their own types, and to exclude all outsiders, has been willing or able to cheat the public of its just expectations and to deprive our soldiers at the front of weapons of war essential to their safety and success. If, however, it was the chief and the actual purpose of these conspirators to delay production, to prevent the construction of airplanes, to deprive the Government and the Army of those eyes of the fighting force upon the possession of which so much depends, then all is explained. That is a theory under which all the facts arrange themselves in orderly and harmonious relation. If all the persons in charge of airplane production, with $1,000,000,000 at their command and nearly a year's time to work in, had actually desired to produce airplanes, would they not have produced them? We need not inquire why anybody should wish to obstruct the execution of the airplane production program. That question answers itself. It is answered by a thousand strange happenings in American industrial establishments during the last three years.

"It is a theory, only a theory, which, however, has the merit of leaving less to be explained than any other, for it would explain completely the whole astounding situation in respect to the building of airplanes. It is now obvious that the investigation of the failure in aircraft production is not a work for any committee of Congress. It involves consequences that lie outside the domain of the legislative department. It is work to be undertaken by a Federal grand jury, and in view of the deceptions practiced upon him, a high officer of the Government, it should be undertaken at the instance of Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it will not be undertaken at the instance of the Secretary of War, of course. I think it is a matter to be undertaken by the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate. Mr. Borglum is perfectly willing to give all his information to the committee, and so stated this morning. He has not declined to furnish the names of witnesses to the committee, except he does not want to furnish them in advance, so that the evidence that these gentlemen would be compelled to bring with them would be destroyed before it could be of use to the committee. A good deal of evidence has already been destroyed, he says; and I am sure he has information of which the committee ought to avail itself. I think when the committee has unearthed whatever the trouble is, whether it is inefficiency or incompetency or criminality, or whether it was unavoidable, then, if anything of a criminal nature is divulged, the Federal district attorneys, of course, can proceed and inflict the penalty.

I want to ask the committee also to do this: There is repeatedly referred to in these articles and correspondence the Marshall report. That report has not been made public. I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will send for that report and get it. I do not ask the passage of a Senate resolution to send it to the Senate, because there may be some things in the report that ought not to be made public. The committee will know when they get it. I hope the committee will give this matter some consideration in executive session, and that this matter will not be allowed to be suspended in nubibus, with these suspicions and charges floating around involving everybody. If there are rascals in the aviation service, the honest men who are in it are entitled to be separated from them in public opinion. If anybody has squandered money or stolen it, the other men ought to be exonerated. The facts ought to be known, and the truth ought to be shown.

I ask, Mr. President, if it meets with the approval of the Senate, that the complete report of the American Aeronautical Society be substituted in the RECORD for the partial one that was read. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has the complete report here, all in typewriting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut to substitute the complete report for the one read?

Mr. KIRBY. What is the request, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut desires to substitute in the RECORD, for the partial report read from the newspaper clipping, the complete report of the American Aeronautical Society.

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator is not going to put both in the RECORD, is he?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, I withdraw the request, and will let the other stand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I supposed that this matter was disposed of a day or two ago, when I attempted to set forth the attitude of the committee. In the absence of the chairman, I want to review the facts again for a few moments.

The Military Affairs Committee was charged with an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether the program of Congress regarding the production of aircraft was being satisfactorily carried out. I am frank to say that for weeks that committee was misinformed and misled by the members of the Aircraft Board and of the Signal Corps who appeared before the committee. Finally, however, the committee ascertained the truth, and told that truth to the Senate in a report which was disagreed to by six members of the committee, but which is vouched for by nine members of the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator will remember that there was no question as to the accuracy of the statements in the majority report.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. None whatever; but there were six members of the committee who objected to having the report made public at that time. Nevertheless, the nine members of the committee took the responsibility of telling the country the truth, which, in the gist, is as follows:

That the manufacture of combat planes during the first year of the war was practically a failure; that at the time that report was made, with the enormous expenditure of money, we had only made and sent to Europe one combat plane. Since then I am told in the public press that some 19 others have been sent. We also told the Senate that the Liberty motor, so called, was just emerging from its stage of development or experimentation. We believed it would become, in a short period, a good motor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We told the Senate that the assurance we had received from the Aircraft Board last June that the Liberty motor could be developed in six months had turned out to be utterly misleading, and its development had taken a year.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. KIRBY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. With reference to the report, the Senator will agree that there were six members of the committee who felt that the report should be made to the President first. That was the position which the six members took in regard to the report.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me answer first the Senator from Florida, if the Senator will permit me. I did not intend to reveal to the Senate the attitude taken by the six members of the committee. It was that a committee of the Senate, charged with an investigation and ready to report to the Senate, should not report until it had first submitted its report to the President of the United States. The majority of the committee felt that beneath the dignity of a legislative body and made its report to the Senate; and it was for that reason that the six members of the committee declined to sign the report which they had had some hand in preparing, the facts of which were not questioned by any of them.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not think the Senator states that exactly as it ought to be stated. Some of these six members insisted that a conference probably should be had with the head of the Government before the report was made; but the most of us who declined to sign this report did so not because the statements contained in it were not reasonably and substantially correct, but because it was incomplete and did not give a correct view of what had been done. That was my reason for signing the minority report—not that the majority report was substantially inaccurate or incorrect, but that it did not give the people any fair view of the actual conditions throughout.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am perfectly willing to have the Senator's explanation go into the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to suggest that the position of the six members was not that they should make a report to the President, but that the facts stated in the document, which was submitted as a report to the Senate, should be first laid before the President, and then that a full report of the whole situation should be made subsequently.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not think we should bring into the Senate unnecessarily these matters which belong in the committee, and I have only done so because the question has been raised by the Senator from Florida. What I am getting at is this:

The Senate committee at that time—on the 10th day of April—made that report of facts to the Senate. The committee is perfectly willing to go into a criminal investigation if the Senate desires it. The committee, however, has no power to punish anyone found guilty in such a criminal investigation. If there is to be any criminal investigation, it is the opinion of the committee that it should be made by the Department of Justice, because the Department of Justice has the power to prosecute.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator from Nebraska think that the Military Affairs Committee, with which he is connected, is charged with the duty, which it can not evade, of investigating this failure in aircraft production, and that it ought to fasten responsibility where responsibility belongs? An officer of the Government has told me that somebody "ought to be shot" for the failure to supply flying machines. I believe there has been not only incompetence in the department charged with supplying aircraft but also criminal neglect, if not affirmative criminality. I think it is the duty of this committee to make a thorough and exhaustive investigation and to brand and pillory those who have betrayed and deceived the President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that is a question too large for the committee to pass upon. There may be ground for criminal charges. If so, in my opinion, the President is the one who should decide that question. The Department of Justice is at his disposal. He not only has the committee evidence and the committee reports, but he has the report made by Mr. Borglum and the report made by his own special committee, chosen by him to investigate the matter. In another case, to which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] calls my attention, where an investigation was carried on by the Senate Committee on Commerce, of which the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is the chairman, the Department of Justice took up the matter where the committee left off and undertook an investigation for the purpose of a criminal prosecution, which is now being conducted.

The committee has stated the facts to the country, and the committee has had a share in bringing about the necessary reform. It is important, as the Senator from Utah says, to expose and to prosecute men who may be responsible and guilty for the substantial failure to produce aircraft; but, after all, the greatest matter at this time is to bring about a reorganization and to produce aircraft. That the President has undertaken to do in the selection of Mr. Ryan and in the reorganization of the agencies of the Government which will operate under his direction and under the direction of the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Stettinius.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has just said that an officer of the Government expressed to him the opinion that somebody ought to be shot for this offense; and it seems to be a very general and widespread opinion in the country, judging from editorials in leading newspapers, that not only has there been a failure, but that there has been a willful and intentional failure to produce airplanes. Now, it is a well-known principle of criminal law, with which the Senator from Nebraska is thoroughly familiar, that those who aid and abet a criminal are guilty. There is such a thing as being an accessory to a crime.

I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska this question: When the official of the Government who is responsible under the President for the aviation program and for the expenditure of over $800,000,000 which Congress has appropriated for this purpose—when the failure has been pointed out to him, when it has become a matter of public scandal, of world-wide notoriety—goes before the committees of Congress and, instead of ordering these men to be shot, defends them and denies that there has been any failure; when the Secretary of War says that we have done better than we expected to do——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will ask the Senator to confine himself to a question, if he will. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the question. Is not the Secretary of War himself an accomplice, and is he himself not the man who ought to be reached by the committees of Congress or others who are proceeding to hold some one responsible?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have no occasion to stand here and defend the Secretary of War, but I believe this fully: The Secretary of War has been as completely deceived by men who have been in position to know the facts as the committee was deceived for months at a time; and I have not any other idea than that the Secretary of War, embarrassed as he is by multitudinous duties and tremendous responsibilities, was himself completely misled by the Aircraft Board and by officers in the Signal Corps.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield for a question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Nebraska believe that the Secretary of War is now laboring under the delusion that the aviation program has been a success?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why, evidently not. The Secretary of War, acting as the agent of the President, has made these changes in the organization. He would not have taken the control of the aircraft production out of the hands of the men who held it if he had had confidence in them. He showed his lack of confidence by his action; and I will say to the Senator that, while I have no means of knowing it, I have every reason to believe that in the natural course of events the Department of Justice will investigate these charges that have been made public, and my own judgment is that any investigation made by the Military Affairs Committee tending to establish the question of whether or not guilt is involved would only impede the Department of Justice at this time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, has the Senator from Nebraska ever heard or seen any expression from the Secretary of War criticizing or condemning any official guilty of this great failure?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have seen this substantial act of condemnation—that he has withdrawn the power and responsibility from the men who formerly had the power and responsibility. That is the best evidence of dissatisfaction with the Aircraft Production Board.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding was that that, with a number of other improvements in the War Department, was planned and practically carried out while the Secretary of War was in France.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been done by authority of the President, and the selection of Mr. Ryan has been since the return of Secretary Baker. I have reason to believe that the full reorganization is not yet complete and can not be completed until the Overman bill is finally enacted.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska, if this matter is as indicated at present—I know nothing about the facts; I am only taking as the basis of my question the report of the Aeronautical Society as to what Mr. Borglum has said—but if this indicates anything like the scope of the situation, is it not entirely too broad for a mere criminal investigation? Is it not too great for the machinery even of the Department of Justice?

I ask that question because it seems to me that it involves these elements. Of course, there is the criminal feature of it, and that, of course, is a matter exclusively for prosecution by the Department of Justice; but then there is evidence, or at least there are charges, of conspiracy that indicate the misuse or the obtaining by false pretense or as the result of conspiracy of hundreds of millions of dollars of the people's money. If that state of facts can be established, these people are not only responsible criminally for such a conspiracy, but they are responsible civilly, and the funds can be followed, and they can be followed into the hands of even those who would appear upon the face of the transaction to be innocent parties.

I recall a case with which I had some connection officially—it originated in the office of the Attorney General prior to my accession to that office, but it was carried on afterwards—of the frauds in connection with the excavation and improvement of the harbor at Savannah, where Oberlin M. Carter, an officer of the United States, had charge of the contract, and he and Greene and Gaynor, of New York, entered into a conspiracy by which fraudulent accounts were passed, and vast sums of money, hundreds of thousands of dollars, were obtained in that manner from the Government. The Government not only pursued them criminally and landed Oberlin M. Carter and Greene and Gaynor in the penitentiary, after following Greene and Gaynor clear through the privy council of Great Britain on questions of extradition arising in Canada, but they followed the $600,000 that it was proved that Oberlin M. Carter had gotten into safe-deposit boxes in Chicago and one in Charleston, W. Va.; they followed this money into real estate, they followed it into stocks and bonds, and the Government eventually recovered the entire amount of which it had been defrauded. So I am only intending to say that this is developing an entirely new phase, and as it was the money that Congress appropriated for a specific purpose, it seems to me Congress ought not to close its eyes or refuse any activity that it can employ to follow the matter out and develop it to see what method of prosecution could be obtained and what action should be taken.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me that the Department of Justice is exactly the body to carry on either a criminal prosecution or a civil action for the recovery of money, and my recollection is that was done in the Oberlin Carter case, to which the Senator from Pennsylvania refers.

I do not want the Senate to have the impression that I am personally opposed or the chairman of the committee or other members of the committee are opposed to the idea of a further investigation. I have been one of the radical members of the committee. I am ready to go on with the investigation, and I know a majority are, if it is the judgment of the Senate that it can properly be carried on. But it is my judgment that this is a matter, as far as it relates to these charges of possible criminal responsibility or civil responsibility, which can be properly and most effectively carried on by the Department of Justice. I have not any doubt of the disposition of the Department of Justice to carry it on.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I know the Senator in discussing this matter has not overlooked the fact that the Senate is vitally interested in the matter. We have appropriated, as has already been stated, $640,000,000. There is now a deficit, and we shall be called upon to make further appropriations. Speaking for myself, I should hesitate to make additional appropriations until I knew something about the method of expenditure and the policy that is to be pursued.

I am sure the people and the Senate want to know what has been done with the $640,000,000 which has been appropriated. It seems to me that this committee is the best agency of the Government to make an investigation. I think it owes it to itself, I think it owes it to the Senate, to probe this matter, to find out what has been done with the $640,000,000, and if in that investigation crime is unearthed to call the attention of the proper officials of the Department of Justice to the fact, and recommend that prosecutions be instituted.

At the proper time I shall move, if the committee does not feel like undertaking this investigation, that the committee be instructed to make a thorough and an exhaustive investigation of the aircraft situation and of the appropriations which have been made by Congress.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I can not but recall that when these great appropriations were being proposed there was a propaganda carried on in the public press with regard to the cost of making airplanes which looked as if it was preparing the public mind to accept a very high figure for the making of airplanes, which I thought grossly exorbitant at the time, against which I protested, and against which I raised my voice at that time in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have taken no part in this discussion at any time, and I do not propose to do so now beyond asking the Senator a frank question.

The committee has made a partial investigation, or has made an investigation and made a report covering the ground that has been traversed. It is alleged in the press, and by individuals as well—it comes to me from various sources—that there is very important testimony that has not yet been submitted to the committee, and that there is some misunderstanding in the minds of some members of the committee on that point. Does not the Senator think before the Department of Justice should be asked to take this matter up the committee should give a further hearing, that those who claim to have further important testimony, whether it is of a criminal nature or otherwise, may present their case to the committee?

Then the committee could reach a finding, and if the committee thought it desirable to make a recommendation to the Department of Justice, and they having exhausted their powers, the committee could do that, and then the President, through the Department of Justice, if he thought the matter was of sufficient moment, could order such an investigation.

I have no feeling about the matter at all. I believe the committee has tried to discharge its duties faithfully and with a view to ascertain the whole facts in this case, but if the committee has not yet probed the matter as far as it can be probed, it seems to me the committee ought to continue its work. That is the only feeling I have about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The committee is perfectly willing, if there is anything substantial and desirable that can be brought before it, either from Mr. Borglum or from any other source, if it is the desire; but, as far as the work of reorganization is concerned, the committee's report to the President has accomplished that. If something further is resolved, it can only be for the purposes of prosecution, and in my opinion if witnesses can be found who have knowledge of a criminal intent or a conspiracy the place for them to reveal their kowledge is before the Department of Justice.

Now, I say this, although I am perfectly willing to go into it: Sometimes a congressional committee investigation is considered an impediment to a Department of Justice investigation. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. BECKHAM. Just for a minute, I ask to interrupt the Senator.

The statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] justifies I think to a large extent the position taken by some of the members of the committee in regard to the majority report. Something has been said about those who did not sign the report. I was one who did not sign it. It was not because I dissented from the facts as substantially stated in the report, but I believed that we were not then ready to make a report. The discussion this morning discloses that fact.

The committee makes a report showing a general failure in aircraft production, but no one can tell from that report where the responsibility lies. I believed at the time I opposed signing it that we or some representatives of the committee should confer with the President or with other officers of the Government to see if they had found out any of the conditions which we suspected. Some of us suspected, but we could not know from the character of the investigation we made, that there might be some sinister or criminal conduct somewhere in this matter. I felt that it was best that we should wait until we could get further light on the subject and give the Senate more information about it before we should make a report.

For that reason I did not sign the majority report, nor did I sign the minority report. I really felt that the committee should go further into this matter and make a further investigation to locate, if possible, the responsibility directly.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the statement just made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], I think it is my duty to say that the report which is made was largely due to the existing conditions regarding the investigations of our committee up to that time. For example, shortly before we determined to make the report a news agency having its headquarters here and its home in Cleveland, and possessed of a very large newspaper clientele, had issued a news statement that was generally published accusing a number of Senators, some of whom belonged to the committee, and one at least who did not, either of being liars or of being ignorant of the actual facts. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], a member of the committee; the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], a member of the committee; the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is not a member of the committee, were directly charged with falsehood or with ignorance and also with attempting to deceive the country with regard to the very satisfactory conditions of aviation. These epithets were followed by as promising and satisfactory and romantic an account of aviation conditions as can be found anywhere in the previous literature of the subject. The committee, therefore, felt compelled in order to meet that condition to make the report at the time it did.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have nothing further to say except that if the Senate will direct the committee to make a further investigation the committee will be willing to undertake it, but I believe I express the judgment of a majority of the committee when I say that the investigation now proposed is more a matter for the Department of Justice than for the committee.

There are a good many matters which have come to the knowledge of the committee which are interesting but the publication of which is not necessarily of any great value. I am going to mention one of them as an illustration, with the consent of the Senate. I have stated that the members of the Aircraft Board came before the Committee on Military Affairs and misled and misinformed the committee, misled the committee for weeks. Now, I will go further. I will say that members of the Aircraft Board as it formerly existed played a gigantic confidence game upon the whole country in the creation of the so-called Liberty motor. I am not saying anything against the merits of the Liberty motor. I hope the highest hopes for it will be realized, but when the members of the Aircraft Board came befor the committee and told the committee, and published in the papers the statement, that the Liberty motor was the magical creation of a few great geniuses gathered in a hotel here in Washington and created within a month, they perpetrated a gigantic confidence game on the whole country.

The Liberty motor is the Packard motor, which it took the Packard Co. three years to develop, with such additions as were put into it by Mr. Hall, of California, in collaboration with Mr. Vincent of the Packard Co. Moreover, under an agreement made last summer by the War Department we are going to pay the Packard Motor Co. for the three years of experimentation and development prior to that time between $500,000 and $1,000,000, and that claim is now in the course of adjustment.

There was no need to conceal this fact and deceive the country in this way. There was no need to appeal to the imagination by such a fraud but that is one of the tricks that the Aircraft Board as formerly organized resorted to.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just stated in substance that the Aircraft Board has deceived the committee and deceived the public. May I ask the Senator whether the investigation went far enough to enable him to express an opinion as to whether they had purposely deceived the committee and the public or were they themselves deceived as to the quality of the motor and what it might do?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not disparaging the Liberty motor, Mr. President. I believe the Liberty motor will ultimately be equal to the great Rolls-Royce motor of Great Britain, which is of a corresponding size and power. What I am saying is that the Aircraft Board deliberately played a great confidence game on the whole country in concealing the fact that they purchased from the Packard Co. the work of three years of development, and that they were going to pay approximately $800,000 for it. They conveyed to the public the idea by frequent statements that down in a hotel here in Washington their engineers had as if by magic created it. I say that is one of the discoveries made by members of the committee. It is not of any particular value. It does not prove the Liberty motor a failure. It does not show criminality, but it shows the character of men who were upon the Aircraft Board.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. NEW, and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator a question, because I am not certain about the fact. I have heard it stated both ways. Is what the Senator calls the former Aircraft Board entirely out of office, or simply has somebody been put in in addition to it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it has been substantially ousted. I will say the change is not complete yet, because until the Overman bill is passed it is probable that the President has not the power to fully reorganize and place the legal responsibility in the hands he wants to place it in, but the old combination is substantially out of office, and as the reform has been brought about and new management has been initiated, the committee thought it doubted the wisdom of further investigation.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. NEW. I was one of those who signed the majority report of the Committee on Military Affairs. I want to say that it was not my understanding at the time that that report marked the close of the activities of that committee at all; that it was a partial report in that it brought the proceedings down to date.

Now, Mr. President, I corroborate what other members of the committee have said during this discussion, that since that report was made additional rumors, at least, if not facts, some of which I confidently believe to be facts, have come to the knowledge of the committee.

I believe it is the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to proceed with this investigation. I think that if the committee fails to go ahead with it and places the responsibility upon the Department of Justice or upon anybody else it fails of its duty, and if in such an event the investigation is not prosecuted, and I do not say it would not be at all, but in the event that it should not be prosecuted, I think the committee would then be open to very serious criticism.

I think the committee owes it to itself to proceed with the investigation in the light of these new disclosures. I think the Senate owes it to the committee to ask the committee to proceed, if any such formality as that is necessary.

Mr. KIRBY obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. KIRBY. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask my colleague if he thinks section 9 of the act creating the Aircraft Board does not give the President all possible authority to change the board entirely and modify it in any way he sees fit?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The answer to that question is this: The bill was badly drawn. It gave the President authority, but directed him to act through the Signal Corps, and until the Overman bill goes into effect my judgment is that he has not power to give any other legal authority.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He has placed in an advisory position Mr. Ryan and taken out of the hands of the Chief Signal Officer the construction of aircraft and put it in the hands of one of the brigadier generals of the War Department. He can do that. I assume that after the Overman bill becomes a law, he may entirely divorce it from the Signal Corps and place the authority directly in the hands of those men who are already there.

Mr. NORRIS. I read section 9 of the law the other day, when we had this matter up, and I can not conceive of a power in relation to aircraft that was not delegated, and while there is at one point language which says that the President shall do something through the Secretary of War, a similar provision was in the law which gave the President authority to take over the railroads. It provided that they should be taken over through the Secretary of War, and when the President took them over, he simply said, "According to law, through the Secretary of War, I hereby take over the railroads." I do not believe the Senator can point out or indicate a single power which makes it necessary to make any change or to add anything in regard to the Aircraft Board which is not already in the law. I may be mistaken, but I do not know of any.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not anything further to say, except that the law specifically mentions the Signal Corps as the department through which the President shall act in the construction of aircraft, and they have been exercising that power under the law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KIRBY. I do.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Nebraska before he takes his seat?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. KING. I take it, from the statements which have been made by the Senator from Nebraska, that he feels that perhaps the Committee on Military Affairs has performed its duty in respect of this matter and that it ought not to further investigate the aircraft situation, leaving to the President or to the Department of Justice any further investigation that may be deemed necessary. I stated a moment ago that if the Committee on Military Affairs does not make further investigation, I should move that it be instructed to investigate the entire matter in a thorough and exhaustive manner. I should very much dislike to make such a motion, certainly in advance of some action hereafter to be taken by the committee.

What I wanted to ask the Senator from Nebraska, however, was: Will not the committee meet in a short time, and can not the Senator assure us that the matter will be presented to the committee with a view to determining whether or not the committee will make further investigation of this question, which is so vital to our country at this time?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs I am not qualified to speak. Individually I should be perfectly willing to again consider the subject in committee. My own judgment is that if the Senator from Utah proposes to introduce such a resolution it would be wise for him to first consult the Attorney General. If the Department of Justice has no plan of action, then it would be perfectly proper for the committee to proceed.

Mr. KING. If I may be permitted to make just one observation——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] has the floor.

Mr. KING. May I further trespass upon the time of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. KING. So far as I am concerned, I do not feel like making any inquiry of the Attorney General to ascertain what his purposes are. I feel, as I said a moment ago, that the duty rests upon the Military Affairs Committee to examine this subject exhaustively. I shall, of course, not offer any resolution or motion at this time, but if the committee shall decline to examine this matter further I shall feel constrained at the proper time to submit a resolution for the consideration of the Senate, calling upon the committee to go to the bottom of this entire matter and report their findings to the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. Before the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] takes his seat I should like to ask him if he has in mind that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs shall investigate the details of the expenditure of money that has been made under the direction of the Aircraft Board?

Mr. KING. I have that also in mind.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that, in a sense, is locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen. If we had a suitable committee on expenditures here, looking after such expenditures, we might have that information, and might quite likely check a great many extravagances which we shall run into in the future.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KIRBY. I think I can finish what I desire to say in a few moments, and I should like to finish before yielding to any further interruptions.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the order of business, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We have not yet proceeded with the business of the morning hour. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is pursuing the debate which was started by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to introduce a bill, and I have been waiting to do so for an hour and 25 minutes.

Mr. KIRBY. I have no objection to the introduction of bills, but I have been standing here about 15 minutes intending to say a very few words, and expect to do so without further interruption.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] in his statement introduced a partial report of a certain aero club investigation, and the Senator from New York said something about substituting the entire report for the partial report. I asked him if he desired to have both reports printed in the RECORD. He evidently took my question for an objection, and said he withdrew the request. I have no objection to having the full report presented, and it ought to be put into the RECORD, rather than the partial report. If that is his disposition I should be very glad if he would submit and have published in the RECORD the full report of that club, instead of the partial report. I wanted to say that much along that line.

I do not understand that the Military Affairs Committee has completed its investigation of this matter. It had reached such a point that it found a report was necessary, or thought it desirable. The report has been submitted; the board has been reorganized; and I would not regard it as proper procedure here for that committee to be instructed or directed to proceed further, until they had indicated a purpose not to do so, or at least until they had considered the matter of whether or not they should do so.

The committee has had no disposition to cover up anything that ought to be revealed. The public expectation has been largely aroused and misled by the roseate reports of newspapers, rather than by any statement which has been given out, as I understand, by the board or by the committee. The condition has been created, a state of mind exists, and now it has brought about the result which has been seen. The committee itself is willing, as I understand, to investigate all things that ought to be investigated. It has been busy from last December until now, continuously, practically, in these investigations, which have resulted in some good.

So far as I am concerned, there was one thing that the investigation disclosed that I did not like. There was nothing wrong about it, so far as I could see; but it displayed a lack of business ability and a lack of disposition to look after the Government's interests. There is a contention between the Wright-Martin people and the Curtiss people about who owns certain patents. Instead of our Aircraft Board taking over the rights in all these patents, paying those people for them, and letting them fight it out about who owned a particular patent or who owned the majority interest in a particular invention, and letting them divide the money as it ought to be divided, they spent a long time in trying to fix up a contract for the payment of royalties to both these companies and for a division of the royalties for manufacturing certain airplanes and using their patents and inventions. I thought that was poor business judgment. If we needed these things we ought to have taken them and paid for them and gone ahead with production.

Further, so far as I am personally concerned, I do not believe the airplane will ever be an effective factor in determining the war, further than for scouting and reconnoitering purposes. I think it will never be, as I say, an effective factor. That is my judgment about it, but I am not exercising my judgment; I am doing what the committee thought ought to be done about the matter, and it ought to be done speedily, and in a businesslike way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLARK of Florida, Mr. BURNETT, and Mr. AUSTIN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 10613) to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse of the District of Columbia, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PRICE OF FARM IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to call up Senate resolution 223, coming over from a previous day, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the high cost of farming implements and various articles which the farmer is obliged to buy in his efforts to bring about production. I should like to have the resolution read and considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate resolution 223.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution in full.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed, under the authority of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its purposes and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, to investigate and report to the Senate the cause or causes for the high prices of the articles hereinafter mentioned required to be bought and used by the farmers of the country on the farms, and to investigate and report the facts relative to the existence of any unfair methods of trade or competition, and relative to any and all violations of the antitrust laws of the United States by manufacturers and dealers in any of the articles hereinafter mentioned in respect to any act, combination, agreement, or conspiracy to restrict, depress, or control the prices thereof, and whether such manufacturers or dealers have committed any acts, agreements, combinations, or conspiracies tending to a restraint of trade in the manufacture, production, or supply of any of the articles enumerated as follows, to wit:

Agricultural implements, including plows, listers, harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, mowers, drills and planters, horserakes, cultivators, thrashing machinery, wagons, buggies, carts; utensils and machinery and equipment required for the production of food, foodstuffs, grains, fuel, fuel oil, natural gas, hides, leather, cotton, and wool.

Bags, bagging, gunny cloth, and grain sacks.

Cream separators, churns, and internal-combustion engines.

Brooms and articles of household utility of tin, wood, or other material.

Necessary wearing apparel, including gloves, jumpers, overalls, shoes, and shirts.

Leather products, including harness, halters, saddles, and buggy whips.

Tools and hardware, including axes, hatchets, nails, staples, padlocks, pitchforks, hoes, shovels, picks, corn knives, grindstones, wheelbarrows, and saws.

Axle grease, lubricating oils, fertilizers, salt for stock, and oil cake.

Lumber, shingles, barrels, rope (hemp), binding twine; barb wire, galvanized wire, steel wire, and wire fencing.

Farm labor.

And that the Federal Trade Commission report whether, under the facts found, the farmers are required to pay an unreasonable price for the things they are required to purchase and use on the farms in the production of food products, and whether they are thereby prevented from making a fair profit for their labor and money expended toward production.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, inasmuch as an arbitrary price has been fixed by the Government on wheat, one of the principal products of the farm, and in view of the contemplated program of price fixing on other farm products, it is highly important to the farmers and to the country that a thorough investigation should be made of the extremely high cost of agricultural implements and other essential things which the farmer is required to buy and use in bringing about production, which is necessary to be considered in connection with fixing the price on the products the farmer produces.

In the discussion of the various bills before the Senate a great deal has been said about the high cost of wheat and other farm products, but little has been said about the extremely high price of everything the farmer is obliged to buy to produce those products. There is not a single thing that enters into his household, his barnyard, or his field but what has greatly increased in price within the last few years, and especially since the commencement of the war; and within the last few months these prices have been soaring upward by leaps and bounds, without any apparent cause. But notwithstanding this fact, the Kansas farmers have answered the spring drive of the Kaiser by sowing 9,500,000 acres of winter wheat and promising a production of about 110,000,000 bushels, more than twice the amount that was produced last year. This insures us more food for ourselves, our allies, and the armies, and more money to buy liberty bonds and to fight the war to a final and successful conclusion. The President is depending upon the farmer who produces the food to help win the war, and he will not be disappointed in the Kansas farmer.

I have here a list of 94 articles, published in the monthly crop report prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving the cost of these articles used by the farmer in 1909 and 1914 as compared with the cost in 1917, showing an increase of from about 10 per cent to several hundred per cent on the things which the farmer is required to use in production, which I ask may be made a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Prices of articles bought by farmers.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have here a statement from the same publication, prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture from information received by him throughout the country, as to the cost of farm labor, which enters so much into the cost of production, in all the States of the Union for the years 1910, 1916, and 1917, which I also ask may be made a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Wages of male farm labor.

State and division.	Per month.						Per day at harvest.						Per day other than harvest.

Mr. THOMPSON. While these statements show increases beyond reason, yet the increases since 1917, especially during the last few months, have traveled upward so rapidly as to make the conclusion inevitable that there is much profiteering all along the line. The truth is, the farmer is being held up at every point possible, and the sooner the facts are known the better it will be for all concerned.

In a speech in the Senate on March 19, 1918, I took occasion to call attention to the high cost of agricultural implements, based upon information I had received from the farmers of Kansas and Oklahoma and other sections of the country; and I desire to refer again briefly to a few of those examples in this connection. I called attention at that time to the fact that in the wheat section of my State a letter received from a farmer, a producer of wheat, at Hays, Kans., showed an advance of 200 per cent in the price of headers. I also called attention to the increase in the price of gang plows of 100 per cent, and in the price of listers of 162 per cent; of drills, 230 per cent; of wagons, 145 per cent; and of barbed wire, 300 per cent.

The farmer does not object so much to having the prices fixed on his products, if deemed necessary during the war, providing the prices are also fixed on the things he is obliged to buy and use to bring about production, at such a figure as will permit him to produce his crops at a fair and reasonable profit. He is like anyone else in business; he can not continue to produce unless there is a fair margin between the cost of production and the prices received for his crops.

The Federal Trade Commission is provided by law with the facilities and functions for investigating these matters, and to furnish the necessary information to Congress and the country; and I have no doubt when their attention is called to this question through this resolution they will at once go to work on this problem, and develop the facts, which will result in great good to both the producer and the consumer, and will aid in the increased production so important to the country at this time.

The Trade Commission have about concluded their valuable work of investigating the packers, and the country awaits with interest their report to Congress. They have no other large investigation work on hand, as I am informed, and can therefore proceed at once with this investigation, and will be able to report in time to do much good in connection with any price-fixing legislation.

I therefore urge the passage of this resolution without delay, that the country may receive the benefit of the investigation at the earliest possible date.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, can the Senator from Kansas tell the Senate who constitutes the Federal Trade Commission at the present time—what its personnel is?

Mr. THOMPSON. I can not give the names of all the members of the Trade Commission from recollection at this time. There have been some changes recently. I know that Kansas is ably represented by Hon. Victor Murdock, formerly a distinguished Member of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Are there any great lawyers on it?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think there are some able lawyers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I observe that they are to investigate infractions of the Sherman antitrust law. Does the Senator think that commission is qualified to do that work?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think they have made investigations of this character in the past. This resolution follows largely the language of other resolutions which have gone to the Trade Commission. They can ascertain and state the facts, at least, to the Senate, where there are some lawyers who will be able to determine the proper course of action; and they can also find the facts for the benefit of the Department of Justice.

Mr. GALLINGER. The trouble is, they might not be facts if they are stated by men who are not competent to consider the great questions that are involved in infractions of the antitrust law.

Mr. THOMPSON. I assume, Mr. President, that members of the Trade Commission will do their duty, and will no doubt follow their usual practice and procedure in finding and reporting the facts found to Congress. I have tried to make the resolution broad enough to cover every feature of the matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let me ask the Senator, with his permission, whether there is ony inhibition placed upon this distinguished commission that prevents them from going on with that work now, without this resolution?

Mr. THOMPSON. I presume not; but the law creating the Federal Trade Commission provided expressely that they could proceed upon resolution by either branch of Congress, and this is the way in which the matter has been presented heretofore in investigations of this character, particularly with reference to the packers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know; but does the Senator think that when a commission is created, the members of which are receiving high salaries from the Government, they ought to sit idly in their swivel chairs until Congress tells them to do something?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not, Mr. President, and I do not believe that they are doing so. They have been proceeding by making various investigations at the request of either branch of Congress, and also on their own initiative, as I am informed; but I desired at this particular time to call special attention to this matter, which is deemed of high importance to the farmers of the country and to the people in the way of securing increased production during the war.

Mr. GALLINGER. How long does the Senator think it would take that commission to make the investigation provided for in this resolution?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it could be done within a few months.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator thinks they could do it within a few months?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it would take a few years at least. I do not know but that it would take eternity to accomplish that result. Perhaps the Senator is not aware of the great duty that he asks us to place on this commission.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it is worthy of an earnest effort, and I believe the Trade Commission will make it if their attention is called to it within a reasonable time, and at least within time to do some good during the present Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is barely possible that they might make a report on buggy whips in a little while. That might not take them a great while; but when they go into an investigation of every possible thing that is connected with the farm and every manufactured article that goes to make up the equipment of the farms of this country, it is absolutely futile for the Senator to say that they can do it in a few months. We know that these commissions do not rush their work very rapidly even when they have one line of investigation; but here there are at least, I should say, between 50 and 100 different things that they are going to investigate. They are going to investigate the International Harvester Co., and find out why they charge more for their narvesters and their binders and their reapers. That will be a very important investigation. They will go up against some of the geatest lawyers of this country in that investigation; and while this commission may be composed of men of great ability, I fear they would find that they are up against men of greater ability than they.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just turned to the Congressional Directory, and has said to me, sotto voce, that he can give the personnel of the Federal Trade Commission. I wish the Senator would do that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the personnel of the commission in last January was as follows: William J. Harris, chairman——

Mr. GALLINGER. He is out.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; he has resigned to run for the Senate. Joseph E. Davies was a member of the Federal Trade Commission, and he resigned to run for the Senate and was defeated the other day.

Mr. GALLINGER. He has probably gone back, I apprehend; has he not? He has not been reappointed, though.

Mr. SMOOT. He has not been reappointed. Then there are William B. Colver, John F. Fort, and Victor Murdock. The last three are members of the commission at present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator repeat those names?

Mr. SMOOT. William B. Colver——

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator know who he is?

Mr. SMOOT. I should prefer not to say anything at this time about Mr. Colver's ability. John F. Fort——

Mr. GALLINGER. A New Jersey man, is he, an ex-governor of New Jersey? I think so.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think he is an ex-governor of New Jersey.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And we all know Victor Murdock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. Now, Mr. President, those three men are going into first an investigation of offenses against the Sherman antitrust law. I know that the Senator from Kansas, himself a lawyer, must confess that the investigation of that matter alone has from time to time staggered the department having charge of offenses against the laws, and in many cases they have practically thrown up their hands in despair in undertaking to fasten upon individuals and corporations infractions of the Sherman antitrust law. That of itself is going to keep this commission busy for the remainder of their lives if they do it thoroughly; but after they get through with that then they are going to take up plows. They are going to Moline to investigate the manufacturers of plows, to find out whether they have increased their prices, and of course the manufacturers of plows must go into the question of the increased cost of raw material and labor, and they will not do that in one day surely. When they get through with that they will take up listers and then they will go to harrows, and then they will take up headers, harvesters, reapers, mowers, drills and planters, horse rakes, cultivators, thrashing machinery, wagons, buggies, carts, utensils, and machinery and equipment required for the production of food, foodstuffs, grains, fuel, fuel oil, natural gas, hides, leather, cotton, and wool. I do not know why they want to investigate the increased price of hides, because that is an advantage to the farmer if it is an advantage to anybody. I do not know why they want to inquire into the increased price of cotton and wool.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is to inquire into the cost of the utensils that are necessary to produce those articles.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not say so.

Mr. THOMPSON. Not the product itself, but the utensils, and it is expressly so provided in the resolution if the Senator will carefully read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not say the utensils.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think I saw an order the other day that the Government had taken over all the wool.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The wool crop of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then when they conclude that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend? The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The conference report on House bill 8753.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall conclude my remarks a little later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule the resolution goes to the calendar.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8753) to amend section 3, title 1, of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am opposed to the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am opposed to the adoption of the conference report upon House bill 8753, commonly known as the espionage bill. I gave to the Senate, when this measure was before the Senate for its consideration, some of the reasons upon which my objection to it rests. The report of the conference committee has accentuated and emphasized instead of lessening and removing those objections, and since I was unwilling to vote for the bill, even in the form in which it was passed by the Senate originally, I am much more unwilling to vote for it in the form in which it is presented by the conference committee.

First of all, I want to direct the attention of the Senate as briefly as may be to the arbitrary powers that are given to the Postmaster General under section 4. I do that because my service on the Post Office Committee renders me better acquainted with the details of postal affairs than anything else, and naturally anything that touches the Post Office Department or its administration attracts my attention first. The bill provides, and by the way this section was in the bill before it went to the conference, although it has been a little amended in conference:

> The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or concern is using the mails in violation of any of the provisions of this act, instruct the postmaster at any post office at which mail is received addressed to such person or concern to return to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed all letters or other matter so addressed, with the words "Mail to this address undeliverable under espionage act" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof, and all such letters or other matter so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the senders thereof under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

This language is so broad that it not only covers the writers of letters but it also covers the publishers of newspapers and other matter. It includes practically everything in the four classified divisions of postal matter. In fact, I think it is as broad as the business handled by the Post Office Department.

Now, what is the situation? What I say by no means is intended to reflect upon the present Postmaster General, who is my warm personal friend, and with whom my official relations are pleasant and agreeable, but I would oppose the granting of this sort of power to any Postmaster General unless very careful safeguards were thrown around it, and that regardless of whether the Postmaster General happened to be my friend and I had confidence in him, or whether my party happened to be in power or not.

If a citizen is charged with violating the espionage law, he must at least be accorded the right of a trial by jury under our Constitution. His guilt must be established in a court under the forms of law, and he goes into court surrounded by the constitutional safeguards that this free Republic throws about its citizens when they are charged with crime. No matter how he is charged or what he is charged with, he can not be punished until his guilt has been determined in that manner. But if anybody writes one letter or mails one newspaper that, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, violates this law or any provision of it, the writer of that letter may lose absolutely forever the right to send all letters through the mails of the United States, and if any publisher of a newspaper happens to send one issue through the mails that in the opinion of the Postmaster General comes within the inhibitions of this act, then every issue and all subsequent issues of that newspaper, coming as it does under the designation of "other matter," could be stopped by the Postmaster General, and that without any jury trial provided for, without any investigation by any court guaranteed or even hinted at. I do not believe that the Senate wants to take that position or to enact legislation of that character.

As far as I am concerned, I do not want to vote and can not vote for legislation of that sort. Even with reference to the fraud-order business, we provided in the very statute which gave the Postmaster General power to stop fraudulent mail from being transmitted by the Government that the person against whom the fraud order is directed should have the right to go into court before the order could become effective. Upon appeal from the decision of this department official the citizen had a right to a trial before a judge and jury before any final decree was entered up against his rights. Surely if we are to adopt any such provision as this in reference to this matter a similar safeguard ought to be thrown about it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Georgia, as I do not myself recall the statutes regarding fraud orders, do those statutes go any further than to exclude the fraudulent matter from the mail? The language the Senator has just called to our attention penalizes the person and denies him the right to use the mail for any purpose, as I understand the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I see what the Senator means.

Mr. KNOX. There is a distinction between that and the fraud-order statute, because it is only fraudulent matter that is penalized and not the individual.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am inclined to think the language goes a little further. I remember a case where it was held to go much further, but I believe the courts finally reversed the action in that particular case.

Mr. KNOX. This is introducing an entirely new element of fraud.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; and it is a dangerous element to introduce. No matter how innocent a man's letter or his newspaper if he commits one indiscretion, in the opinion of one human being, subject to all the human limitations, he might lose his right forever under such a law as this without any judicial ascertainment of the fact——

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to submit to the Senator from Georgia an inquiry, because he is familiar with the entire postal legislation. Have we any statute which is phrased in the way in which this bill is, namely:

> The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or concern is using the mails in violation of any of the provisions of this act.

Are not all our statutes founded upon the fact that it is to be determined first by the Postmaster General? Have we any other statute which says that the matter may be excluded if in the opinion of the Postmaster General it has been satisfactorily shown that the matter is so-and-so?

Mr. HARDWICK. As far as I know we have not. Let me say, further, to the Senator from Iowa what is one of my chief concerns about this section. The language is so written and the idea is so expressed that I am afraid the courts will say this matter of discretion was made by act of Congress and by the language employed by Congress, so that anything satisfactory to the Postmaster General would be sufficient ground for his action.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield first to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say in addition to the statute of fraud orders referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania we have two other statutes that I recall, one in reference to the Louisiana lottery and the other as to obscene literature. I think this is in the main on the same line with that relating to obscene literature. It allows the Postmaster General to exclude it from the mails.

Mr. KNOX. Yes; to exclude the obscene, lewd, and lascivious literature, but does it penalize the man who sends it through the mail by not permitting him to send other matter through the mail or receive other matter?

Mr. NELSON. I do not think this statute does that.

Mr. KNOX. I was putting the construction on it placed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Minnesota I would like to state that there is a statute which permits the Postmaster General to return to the sender, without opening, any letter which has been transmitted through the mails, even though that letter may be entirely innocent and not connected with a fraud. But, answering the question suggested by the Senator from Georgia, as I understood him, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa as to whether there was any other statute of this character, I have here the statute of September 19, 1890, found in Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 465, which reads as follows:

> The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or company is engaged in conducting any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money, or of any real or personal property by lot, chance, or drawing of any kind, or that any person or company is conducting any other scheme or device for obtaining money or property of any kind through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, instruct postmasters at any post office at which registered letters arrive directed to any such person or company, whether such agent or representative is acting as an individual or as a firm, bank, corporation, or association of any kind, to return all such registered letters to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed, with the word "Fraudulent" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof.

In a subsequent act this legislation was broadened, and it extends to all letters that may be sent, regardless of whether they were mailed or not. In a very full and complete consideration of that statute by the Supreme Court of the United States, in an able opinion by Mr. Justice Brown, the validity of this statute is upheld and the wisdom of this legislation is justified.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator refers to the lottery decision?

Mr. KING. No; to obtaining money or property by fraudulent representation or any scheme or device of a deceptive character.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield.

Mr. NELSON. For just a moment I wish to call attention to the statute relative to obscene matter, and so forth. It provides:

> Whoever shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, or shall knowingly take, or cause the same to be taken, from the mails for the purpose of circulating or disposing thereof, or of aiding in the circulation or disposition thereof, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I think the trouble is that in both cases referred to by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Minnesota the ascertainment of the fact as to whether the matter be obscene or not or whether the matter was fraudulent or was lottery matter or not was left to the court and jury. Certainly that is true with reference to the statute last quoted, because it says "upon conviction shall be fined" so much. Conviction by whom? Not by the Postmaster General but by a court and jury acting under the Constitution of the country. However, I merely want to suggest that this power is so broad and so arbitrary and there are so many possibilities for both its misuse and its abuse that I hesitate to grant it unless it be carefully guarded, carefully hedged about, and carefully protected; and I am sure the Senator from Utah is in sympathy with the proposition.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I understand the Senate placed in the bill an amendment——

Mr. HARDWICK. It amended it.

Mr. KING. But I think there is no amendment by the conferees except to narrow it, and that technically is not an amendment. As I understand it, the only words that are added to the amendment are "during the period of the war," and in view of the fact that the legislation itself indicates that it is only to be enforced during the period of the war, it is manifest that those are words of surplusage, a mere act of supererogation, so that this bill comes back to us in that respect just as it passed the Senate. So I think a point of order would be made, although as to that the Senator from Georgia is far better informed than I am, that it would not be subject to consideration or review again by the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think there is no such rule as that. While that might affect the action of the conferees of the Senate, and while doubtless this argument ought to have been presented sooner to the Senate, I will say this amendment was very hastily adopted and without full consideration.

I know I did realize its full import when the Senate first acted upon it. But when a conference report comes back I believe the Senate ought to be apprised of every reason why, in the opinion of Senators who object to it, the conference report ought not to be adopted, because we have then arrived at the final stage of legislation, our last opportunity to correct mistakes, and unless we now urge such objections, even if we ought to have urged them sooner, the opportunity to urge them at all will be lost and the country itself will be injured. Of course there is no rule of parliamentary procedure relating to the matter.

I submit to the Senate for its consideration whether or not this does not go entirely too far; whether or not, if we are to enact legislation, the legislation should not carry in it, connected with it, the plain, express provision for an appeal to the courts for the determination of this question, for a review of the action of the Postmaster General, and that before any such action shall be carried into effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARDWICK. For a question.

Mr. KING. Permit me just to say in reply to my distinguished friend that the courts have uniformly held that without a statute giving the right of review any person who claims that he was injured would have the right.

Mr. HARDWICK. And yet in this other case relating to postal matters we have provided that the Postmaster General shall not arbitrarily ruin men pending the review. That is the trouble. You let him do this—take away a man's right and ruin his business, suppress his newspaper—and then, when it is too late to do any good, you say let him appeal. We ought to require, pending the judicial determination, that no such arbitrary action as this shall be taken on mere departmental initiative.

Mr. President, there are one or two other things in connection with this matter that when the measure was before the Senate I discussed somewhat at length, and therefore it will not be necessary for me to go over the ground I then covered. I very much object on amendment No. 5 to the insertion of terms so general that they may give rise especially in troublesome and hysterical times to the persecution of perfectly loyal American citizens. Let me call the attention of Senators to one of these expressions:

> or to promote the cause of its enemies.

In a way everybody here is willing to punish anyone who really and truly promotes the cause of the enemies of this country, and to provide a statute as stringent and as drastic as human pen can write to do it. But let us see exactly how the statute might be applied, and let us see the danger unless the language is more carefully guarded than seems to have been done in this measure.

Not so very long ago, on two separate occasions, the President of the United States addressed both Houses of Congress in joint session assembled discussing what are termed war aims and peace conditions. Even the President was not exempt from the most drastic criticism because he discussed these matters, and a distinguished New York lawyer, one of the leaders of the bar of that metropolis of the country, while guarding his utterances very carefully, and while careful to see that there was no personal disrespect to the President in his language, insisted that the President of this Republic had injured the cause of the country, and had really promoted the cause of its enemies by discussing war aims and peace conditions at all, and many newspapers in this country were teeming with inflammatory editorials of the same sort.

I quite agree with any Senator who might contend or feel that at present the United States is in no condition and has no reason to discuss peace conditions; until its rights are established and its honor vindicated it ought not to do it; but this law is made for the entire period of the war through all its development and all its stages. The time may come when we can with honor and with profit discuss peace conditions. When we have established the rights and vindicated the honor of this country on the battle field, and wrung from our opponents an acknowledgment of our rights, surely then we might at least consider the question without any disloyalty to this country or the possibility of being prosecuted for doing so.

Yet I venture to state without the slightest fear of successful contradiction that whenever that time comes there will be many people in this country and many leading newspapers that will insist that the bare suggestion that the time has come to make peace injures the cause of this country and promotes the cause of its enemies. If that be true what a marvelous condition of affairs we will have. Free speech in a free country will simply mean that you can speak freely if you will agree with what I believe and not at all if you do not. Free speech in a free country will simply mean that one man is perfectly free to advocate war to the end of eternity and another man can not advocate peace without putting himself in a dungeon. That is the difficulty about this kind of legislation. Let me illustrate by reading from a recent letter—I am not going to read the name of the writer—written me by a farmer. He evidently went to somebody's office and had a typewriter to write it; but he writes me that he is a farmer living in one of the Southern States, not my own, and he is evidently a man of very keen and incisive mind. He writes me with reference to some of my addresses to the Senate on this very subject. He states:

> I thought, just as you say, that we entered this war because our rights on the high seas had been violated and our citizens killed in violation of international law. Now, some other people think—that is, if we may judge them by their utterances—that we went to war because of injuries inflicted upon Belgium; still others hold we are in this conflict for the purpose of restoring Alsace-Lorraine to France; others contend that we are battling for the purpose of establishing world-wide democracy, whatever that is.
> Now, I am just a plain farmer and have no schoolbook education, except that acquired prior to my fifteenth birthday; I am no lawyer, and, therefore, do not know what rights I possess. As a matter of information, I should like to know if, under the proposed espionage law, I should think and say sometime in the future—say, after a decisive battle in which a few million more Huns had been slain—that my anger had been appeased, and I thought my country had secured its rights, or could do so, and this was a good time to negotiate peace—if I did, then could my neighbor, who held to the Belgium theory, successfully prosecute me for disloyalty? On the other hand, if Belgium should be restored and our rights vindicated and both myself and my Belgian friend were satisfied, could our Alsace-Lorraine friend put us both in jail for saying so?
> Again, presuming that the French regained possession of Alsace-Lorraine, and the trio of us—myself, who stood only for American rights, my Belgium friend, and my Alsace-Lorraine friend—were all satisfied, could our world-wide neighbor have us all shot at sunrise for this expression of our opinion; or am I to understand, in case the entire quartet of us—myself, my Belgium friend, my Alsace-Lorraine friend, and my world wide neighbor—all collectively expressed the opinion in the corner drug store that the cause of us all had been vindicated and the time had come to conclude peace, could we still be shot at sunrise because we had not waited until the President, or some other man that we by our votes had elevated to office, told us the time had come when we could speak?

This gentleman has very forcibly suggested some things that have been worrying me a good deal about this bill. I should like to see the language of this bill guarded, if it is to be passed at all, so that there could be no doubt that the right of free speech should not be denied to loyal citizens of this Republic, and without impairment of our constitutional guaranties—guaranties that are not suspended, can not be suspended, and ought not to be suspended by war, and which the people can be trusted to properly exercise, and not to abuse.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator kindly call our attention to the specific provision of the bill which he fears will involve any such prosecution as that suggested in the letter?

Mr. HARDWICK. I did that. In my remarks I cited that part of the bill which referred to anybody who sided against the cause of our country. I quite understand that one construction of that means simply the side our country is on in the war our country is waging. I know that is the view the Senator would suggest.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but I was merely endeavoring to locate the provision; that was all.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator will remember the language to which I refer. We had this matter up before.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but the Senator feels that a prosecution such as is suggested in the letter might be brought under that clause?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I am afraid so.

Mr. WALSH. There is not any other clause of which the Senator can think under which such an act could be prosecuted?

Mr. HARDWICK. I cited some other language under the fifth amendment "or to promote the cause of its enemies." It is practically the same proposition, however.

Mr. WALSH. That is in the same clause.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. I am afraid that the use of the word "cause" is liable to make confusion. I think if we had merely said "anybody who sides against the United States in the war," there would not have been any possibility of any such thing as this, because nobody who advocated peace under the circumstances that he thought the honor and the interests of this country permitted would have a perfect right to do so; although I think it would be best for him, as a matter of patriotism, to make it plain in the same breath, that he did not propose to interfere and did not want to interfere with the prosecution of the war.

Mr. President, I am going to ask the Secretary of the Senate in just a moment to read a letter on the subject matter of this bill, which has been recently written to me by a lady, whom I regard as probably the most distinguished woman in the entire Southern States, an old lady of wide and varied experience in life, the widow of a former distinguished and brilliant Member of the House of Representatives from Georgia in the period just after the war; I think a lady who is generally conceded in our State to be probably its most intellectual and most brilliant woman. She has given to the Senate her views on this subject, which she has asked me to present, and I think it is worthy of serious consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

> CARTERSVILLE, GA., April 30, 1918.
> Hon. T. W. HARDWICK,
>
> I make free to present this petition to you because I have something in my own possession that is not owned by any Member of the United States Senate, so far as my information reaches, namely, experience in a personal way with the difficulties of the Civil War time and full acquaintance with what another gospel of hate did to wreck the fortunes of the Southern Confederacy. To make my meaning plain, I heard a wealthy merchant in my town, addressing another citizen in my presence, use the following words: "Something must be done to make our people furiously mad with the Germans or we will not raise the quota of liberty bonds."
>
> During the fateful years between 1861 and 1865, in the Confederate States, whenever anything, any action, was called for by the Confederate Government it was ushered in and championed by a tremendous hate propaganda against Yankees. To illustrate, when Atlanta surrendered to Gen. Sherman I was a refugee with my family, and we awaited news from the front with painful anxiety. I knew that my father and my mother had been living in a cellar in the home of my sister on Peachtree Street, in Atlanta. I had heard nothing of their escape from the town. The newspaper that brought the first tidings read this way:
>
> "The legions of Old Ape took possession of the city at half past 10 o'clock. They had a ball that night attended by Gen. Sherman and his staff. It was an orgy of ———, where victory was glorified by dances with negro women until a late hour of the night," etc. That made us all mad, right enough. The scheme worked. We were daily and hourly fed upon fiery news items. It was considered treason to contradict or dispute such statements. "Old Ape" was about the easiest title that was conferred on Mr. Lincoln. Negro miscegenation was the thing to be relied upon to raise up the very mud sills of hatred to the Federal Government. The North also had its hate makers.
> The awful thing about the war is the free rein that is given to the gospel of hate.
> Last Friday I witnessed a great public-school celebration in my own town. The certificates for school progress I did not hear, but the highest honor for selling war stamps—known to us as thrift stamps—was awarded a small school; and when the school children filed out I saw the framed certificate as it passed me, and in the hands of the teacher, and it had two pictures on it, representing the two greatest men known to the United States, and one was the picture of President Wilson and the other—hear it, Mr. Senator—was the likeness of Abraham Lincoln! Nevertheless, I am of the opinion that Son-in-law McAdoo got his pictures mixed in transit. This one that passed by me was probably intended for northern climates or, perhaps, for the negro schools of Georgia. Less than 25 years ago any candidate for public office who exhibited a picture of Mr. Lincoln as one of the two greatest men that ever lived in America would have been tarred and feathered, and, perhaps, ridden on a rail, as that German woman was served in the State in which Mr. Lincoln lived when he died.
> I am an old lady—will reach my eighty-third birthday within a few short weeks. I am here to tell you that the gospel of hate may gratify vindictive human passion, but it gets you nowhere as a propaganda for security or progress in our own country. I know whereof I speak. The northern people who settled in the South before the Civil War had to make choice of residence during the war of the sixties. Many of them acted wisely in going back North or going to England, South America, or maybe Mexico. My advice to Germans in the United States who fled from their foreign land to find a home and a welcome and a living in this free country, would be to go somewhere during this war, especially if the bill before Congress, known to me as the alien and sedition bill, becomes a law. If the States of this Union have lost all power to protect the people of the States from attempts to burn down and blow up, and this gospel of hate is as powerful as I knew it to be in the Confederate era, any evil-disposed person can wreak both spite and vengeance upon a personal enemy if there is a single person of German lineage near enough to be hinted at or suspicioned. I have no German blood in my veins. I have no kindred to shield from mob law. But I expect them to still retain affection for their kindred in Germany. I should think less of them, and so would you, if they did not attempt to correct statements made to them and in their hearing that were false. But they would risk their liberty and mayhap their lives to do so. Witness the hanging of the man at Collinsville, Ill., and the mob action at Collinsville, Okla.! As a very aged patriot, with varied experiences in Civil War times, I am admonished that it is a dangerous thing to combat any war falsehood in States like my own, and I am also of the opinion that Georgia is a favored Commonwealth, without strike periods or sedition workers.

I am writing these words to you because of the politics—the hysterical demand at this time prevailing to give legal authority to the President to do what he pleases, say what he pleases, and punish whom he pleases during the entire war period. He even dictates the candidates who may run for Congress, and especially for the Senate, and treason is openly charged if any man differs with his favoritism or his management or his selections. You remember the denunciation of your colleague, Hon. HOKE SMITH, after he addressed the university students at Athens nearly a year ago, because he admitted in the speech that he had differed with President Wilson on some of his war policies, and he was arraigned and condemned before the bar of public opinion by a superior-court judge as a traitor because of such admission or explanation. In the printed words of a critic, "Judge Cobb went for our Senators like Joshua went for the Canaanites. He smote them hip and thigh." He said in substance, "When a nation is at war it knows only two classes of people—traitors and patriots." The sin that the Georgia Senators had committed was differing with the President on matters brought before the Senate to be granted or defeated. Judge Cobb believed in doing only those things approved by the President, and failure to support such views was called treason. I was interested in another pointed statement: "Judge Cobb's speech against Senator SMITH was worthy of the best accents of his father in Congress. Senator SMITH'S speech did not suit Judge Cobb."

When Judge Cobbs's father was active in Congress and in Georgia I was also living, full grown and 21. His speeches in Congress and in Georgia on the secession question were loud and violent and always for war, just before Georgia seceded. He was commander in chief of Georgia troops—for home defense—at the time of the surrender. Whatever might be done in Georgia for protection of the helpless and the innocent, he was expected to do. There was a drastic law in force, conscripting all white males from 16 to 60, and yet Gen. Sherman marched all the way from Atlanta to Savannah, virtually unopposed. That was the time "to do or to die," as we were exhorted to perform in that era of Confederate history. I suppose I was admonished a full thousand times that our independence was really assured and that our statesmen in Congress and political generals in the field would never give up while life lasted and the "powder was dry."

Now, what happened? Georgia surrendered to Gen. Wilson in April, 1865. I was in Macon, Ga., during the forenoon, and Gen. Wilson occupied the city in the afternoon. I was told that the city would be looted and maybe burned very soon. I asked in frantic fear, "Have we no defense? Is there nobody to stand for the defenseless women—of which I was one—and children?" I was directed to see Gen. Cobb, and was told to go outside the front door of Mr. John Burke's bookstore, and I could interview the commander in chief of the Georgia military forces. I went out, as directed, but I never opened my mouth to ask a question. The general was sitting there, dressed in citizen's garb, and the only people who had gone forward to meet the enemy was a squad of citizens who went to beg for protection from an advancing army, followed by hundreds of camp followers, black and white, bent on loot and destruction. Mr. Burke's bookstore and his large printing establishment went up in smoke that night.

Smart people and some wise people can and do make miscalculations and mistakes. I have waited patiently for somebody to rise up and say what all sane and sensible Georgians ought to say—"Be careful what you do in Congress, representing the people at home, when these mothers' boys can be sent 3,000 miles away, to die in bloody trenches before German guns!" "The danger is too great for serious mistakes and risks."

I can testify in any presence that we went into the Civil War to protect the institution of slavery in the United States. Slavery was the question in dispute. If there had been no slaves, there would have been no war. Nevertheless, the Confederate Veterans still meet annually in a great convention, and the Daughters of the Confederacy have organizations in nearly every State in the Union to memorialize the "glorious cause" and the fadeless patriotism of the contest of the sixties, which destroyed billions in values and the lives of many, many thousands of human beings who were led into defeat by the mistakes and miscalculations of people representing the masses in Congress and who voted away money and human safety with incalculable speed and with very apparent lack of even the basic attributes of statesmanship. It is astounding that the politicians, North and South, only took counsel with the gospel of hate in the Civil War. It must have been apparent to outsiders that slavery was not a fitting cause for such bloody sacrifice. I was one of many thousands who came out penniless, and the longer I live the more I am convinced that Representatives in Congress, both House and Senate, should be exhorted constantly to keep in mind the people who will suffer by the horrors of war, and to carefully scan every legislative act that may work injustice and money loss to the people at home of all classes. When Congress ceases to represent the plain people, this Republic is a failure.

The President is obliged to do business through his subordinates, and he and they have human limitations. Omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience can meet this condition of affairs in America and Europe. Nothing else can, and to turn over the specified business of the American Congress to one man or any set of Cabinet officers, under one man's direction, without curb or limit, smacks either of laziness on one side or craven cowardice on the other.

The very weakest link in the chain of our national argument as to why the United States entered the war a year ago, waiting nearly three years to consider whether we were "too proud to fight" or whether the success of world democracy was in peril, lies in the failure or oversight on the part of the President to get a plain signed agreement from the King of England, the King of Belgium, and the King of Italy that they were also fighting this battle to make the world safe for democracy. The Romanoff and Russia collapsed at the same time, and I often wonder if we are going to be like the Hebrews in Samuel's time, anxious for a king.

There is a verse in Jeremiah—second chapter, eleventh verse—that I call to your attention. The Hebrews were then suffering under kingly rule and going headlong into captivity and ruin:

"Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods? But my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit. Be ye very desolate, saith the Lord."

Very respectfully,

Mrs. WILLIAM H. FELTON.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, for the reasons I have given to the Senate I consider it my duty to oppose this conference report and I shall vote against it.

In taking this position I am well aware that I will subject myself to bitter but undeserved criticism. It will be contended by cheap politicians and by still cheaper newspapers that I am disloyal to the country because I do not think that this particular measure, in its present form, ought to pass, because I believe that freedom of speech is unwisely and unnecessarily abridged by some of its provisions.

I have never believed that it is necessary or advisable, in order to prosecute this war successfully, to reverse all of the processes by which this country has grown great and strong or to imperil or destroy the rights and liberties of its citizens. The very reverse is true on both propositions. While I have always been willing to grant to the President complete and exhaustive authority over all matters that are purely executive, and especially such as relate to the performance of his duties as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, yet I have never believed that it was either necessary or wise to grant to the President or anybody else autocratic and despotic power over the citizens of the United States and their ordinary civic affairs. I have always believed in the soundness of the basic foreign policy advocated by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—indeed, by all of the founders and fathers of the Republic, without notable exception—which laid it down as a fundamental proposition that this country ought to avoid foreign entanglements and hold aloof, so far as its honor and safety permitted, from European wars. For that reason I was anxious to avoid and did all in my power to avoid any entanglement in the present war; but when Germany arrogantly ordered us off the seas and impudently announced her intention to pursue, in violation of all international law, an unrestricted submarine warfare against peaceful ships of commerce, and also announced her intention to direct that warfare at her wish or whim against our flag and our ships, I unhesitatingly and warmly supported the legislation considered by Congress in March, 1917, that authorized the President to arm and defend the merchant ships of the country. In my judgment—and, of course, I criticize no Senator who thought otherwise—the honor of the country required us to adopt that course.

Besides, it was a last warning to Germany, conveyed in the most solemn manner that a nation may employ, that if she executed her threats this Nation would not hesitate to go to war if it should be necessary to do so in order to protect our flag and to vindicate our right to the freedom of the seas.

When Germany actually executed her threat and fired upon the American flag I unhesitatingly and warmly supported the joint resolution of Congress accepting the state of war that Germany had thrust upon us and pledging the power and resources of this country to the prosecution of that war. As I viewed it, Mr. President, no other course was consistent with our honor or our safety or even possible if we expected to retain the respect of other nations or our own self-respect. I voted for the war and have done and will gladly do all in my power to provide for its adequate and successful prosecution.

We came next in this body to the consideration of legislation that was necessary for the conduct of the war, the plans that were to be adopted, the methods that were to be pursued in preparing for its prosecution and in prosecuting the war—a work that is still in progress and that can not of necessity be concluded until the war itself is over.

The first matter of the kind upon which the Senate was compelled to pass was the method of raising an army. The Constitution of the United States (Art. I, sec. 8, par. 12) vests the power of raising an army in the Congress, not in the War Department, nor yet in the President. It was the duty of Congress and of each and every Member of both Houses of Congress to help determine what plan should be followed and what methods should be employed in the raising of an army. The question of how an army ought to be raised—not how it ought to be employed after it is raised—is a great civic, economic, industrial, social, and political question in which are bound up the rights and liberties of a great people. In a free land and among a free people the decision of such a question is wisely left with the direct representatives of the people, responsible to them at frequent intervals, rather than to Executive authority.

In due course this matter of how an army ought to be raised came to the Congress for settlement. The military authorities and the President urged the adoption by Congress of conscription, or the draft system. After long, patient, and thorough investigation of the great questions involved, I came to the conclusion, for reasons that I gave to the Senate at considerable length on April 27, 1917, that the traditional plan that had always been followed in this country, except in defense of its soil, of raising an army under what is known as the volunteer system was wiser and better than the so-called draft or conscription plan. For the purposes of this discussion it is not necessary to recapitulate the arguments I then made. Suffice it to say that the considerations I then presented to the Senate were sufficiently strong to carry complete conviction to my mind, and consequently I opposed conscription and favored the volunteer system.

It was my right, as a Member of the Senate, charged with the duty and clothed with the power under the Constitution of our country to raise armies, to advocate and support whatever plan for raising an army I thought wisest and best. That duty I discharged according to my own judgment and in obedience to the dictates of my own conscience, and for the manner in which I discharged it I have neither regret to express nor apology to offer.

When, however, the majority of my associates in both Houses of Congress determined upon conscription and enacted a bill carrying that plan into law, and the bill was approved by the President, another and quite a different question presented itself. While it is unquestionably both the right and the duty of every Senator and every Representative to give to the country his own best judgment while policies are being formulated and laws are being enacted, and to do so honestly, independently, and fearlessly, it is likewise incumbent on him and on every citizen of the Republic as well, as a matter of duty and of patriotism, both to support and obey the law, when a policy does crystallize into law, however much he may have opposed its enactment or favored its repeal. This is, I believe, the elementary rule and is at the same time the real acid test of both patriotism and loyalty in a free country where men have a right to express their own opinions and to possess souls that they venture to call their own.

In the State of Georgia there was undoubtedly general and widespread opposition on the part of many thousands of its people to the enactment of the draft law. Numerous and largely attended mass meetings held in every part of the State protested against it, and in many instances challenged its constitutionality. In Georgia there are no pro-Germans nor is there the slightest trace of pro-German sentiment anywhere in its borders. With a population of almost, if not quite, 3,000,000 people, only six-tenths of 1 per cent is foreign born, and even with that negligible foreign population only a small part can be classified as German-Americans. Georgia is one of the old American States, and while it has its full share of the white man's burden to bear, it has absolutely no foreign-born problem on its hands. Its people are of the old colonial stock, absolutely loyal to the country and whole-heartedly American to the very core. There the traditions of the fathers and founders of the Republic still live, and there the principles of the fathers are still cherished. There the love of freedom still blazes in the hearts of the brave, and there true, unadulterated, and unterrified Americanism still lives and still flourishes. No man who is both honest and intelligent and who understands the situation would be either so rash or so careless of the truth as to either assail or question the loyalty or the patriotism of the untold thousands of Georgians who were opposed to the enactment of the conscription law. That such opposition was not only general but intense can not be doubted. So strong was the feeling of opposition that many of the citizens of Georgia, thoughtful and responsible gentlemen, including many of our judges and prosecuting attorneys, urged me after the draft bill had passed to issue a public statement advising a full and peaceful compliance with the draft law. Personally, I was of the opinion that these gentlemen were unduly and unnecessarily alarmed and misapprehended the real temper and the inherent law-abiding character of our people and greatly exaggerated the danger of disturbance or resistance as the day fixed for registration approached. However, I promptly, cheerfully, and fully complied with their request, issuing the following public statement to the people of Georgia, which was published there on June 3, 1917, two days before the day fixed for registration:

Rumors that are no doubt grossly exaggerated are flying thick and fast to the effect that there will be general and in some quarters even forcible resistance to registration on June 5, and possibly to other features of the selective-service law later. I can not credit these reports to any great extent. That they are grossly exaggerated must be true. I can not think otherwise. No man in all the United States who loves this country and is loyal to it could possibly be more opposed than I have been and am to the policy of the selective-service law. So long as it was a question of policy that we were to adopt I fought it to the last ditch, to the bitter end. So far from regretting that, I glory in it. I thought then and I still think that I was right; but once a measure is enacted, in the manner and form required by our Constitution, it becomes the law of the land, and so long as it remains such it is the bounden duty of every good citizen to respect it and obey it, however much he may have opposed its enactment or may favor its repeal. The bill, right or wrong, is the law. Obedience to it, submission to it, and compliance with it is the duty of every good citizen, and surely those who love liberty and are true to its principles will be the very last to withhold obedience to the law. I do not anticipate disturbance of any kind in Georgia, and I shall be deeply grieved if serious disturbances occur there or anywhere else in our country. Regardless of differences about policies, it is the first and foremost duty of every loyal American to stand by his country and to render full and willing obedience to its laws.

Such was the view that I then maintained and expressed and still hold and still maintain. Such, likewise, has been my position with reference to all the so-called war measures to which I have not been able to give my consent, and which I have voted against. I opposed the food-control bill, while the question of policy was pending before Congress, because I thought we had ample legislation already to restrict and prevent profiteering and because I believed it would have been far better to have amended and perfected that legislation, if it was necessary to do so, rather than to force a food control upon a country with powers that I considered autocratic, despotic, and unnecessary.

While the question of policy was pending before Congress I unhesitatingly opposed the War Finance Corporation bill, because I was absolutely certain that a few simple amendments to the Federal banking laws, enlarging and liberalizing the classes of securities admissible for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks, would accomplish every good purpose sought by the bill without creating another large and expensive and unnecessary executive agency. In like manner I opposed the railroad bill, because I do not believe in Government operation of the railroads and because I was certain we could accomplish the purpose sought by this bill without taking over the railroads or operating them.

In like manner I opposed the original espionage bill, and I now oppose this amendment to the espionage law as wholly unnecessary and as utterly violative of the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech and freedom of press.

Mr. President, whenever and wherever I have opposed measures suggested by the administration, or by anyone else, for the prosecution of this war it has been simply and solely because I felt it necessary to do so in the performance of my duty as I saw it and because I believed in each case that a simpler and wiser and better plan could be substituted for the specific plan or measure that had been suggested or was under consideration. In a general way I have not been able to give my support to any measure which disregarded and reversed the ordinary and normal processes by which the Nation had grown great and rich and strong and under which its people had remained free, and sought to substitute for these processes plans and methods and processes copied from autocratic governments abroad and ill suited, in my opinion, to the free institutions and liberty-loving citizens of this great, free Republic. All these abnormal plans have been so many monkey wrenches thrown into the machinery. I have not thought that we could gain any strength or efficiency for the prosecution of the war itself by disregarding and reversing our own processes. On the contrary, I believe with all my heart and soul that the very reverse is true, and while the record is not yet fully made up, I believe my view is being vindicated every day with astonishing and increasing force. I have not thought, in order to win the war, that it was necessary to either abridge or destroy American liberties. On the contrary, I believe the very reverse is true.

Mr. President, for my vote on these measures and on each of them I am answerable to the sovereign constituency whose commission I hold in this body and to it alone. Other than that constituency I have no master, acknowledge none, and obey none. Upon each measure that comes before the Senate I must and will continue to vote as my conscience and judgment dictate, striving to do the right and avoid the wrong as God gives me the light to see. Such must be my course so long as I remain a member of this body. Service here under any other conditions or upon any other terms would be impossible. My power and authority as a Senator from Georgia I can never delegate or surrender to anybody on this earth. My responsibility for my conduct and my votes I can never shirk or pass on to another, be he President of the United States or what not.

The people of Georgia are soon to pass on my stewardship of this great office, and to their decision, when it is rendered and whatever it may be, I shall bow in contented submission. If they approve my views and indorse my positions, as I confidently believe they will, I shall endeavor to continue to do my best to advance their interests and to protect their liberties. At the same time I shall endeavor to do my whole duty by the people of the United States and shall give to the country the benefit of my honest and independent judgment on each question that I am called upon to consider. If the people of Georgia do not approve my course, I shall cheerfully and willingly lay down the burden of office and shall wish for whoever they select to succeed me a career of honor, vigor, and usefulness here; but so long as I am here, while policies are being formulated and before they crystallize into law, I shall continue to give to my constituency and to the country, as fearlessly as I can, the benefit of my own unbiased and independent judgment as to what I think is best and wisest and safest for the country. I shall do so regardless of the amount of slander, misrepresentation, and calumny I am called on to face from unscrupulous newspapers and designing demagogues, who, in a period of strain and stress, of excitement and hysteria, confuse loyalty to the country with unmanly subserviency to an official, and who purposely ignore the fact that every Senator owes his country a high duty, in no respect less sacred and in many respects little less important than the duty of the President himself. Whenever bills ripen into statutes and policies crystallize into law, then obedience to the law is the bounden duty of every loyal American, be he President of the Republic, Senator of the United States, Representative in Congress, or citizen in private life; but until bills do ripen into statutes and policies do crystallize into law it is not only the undoubted right but also the undoubted duty of every Senator and Representative to give to the country the best that is in his heart and head and to give to the country his own independent judgment, based on the best information that he can obtain and the most careful consideration of which he is capable, with reference to each and every bill that it becomes his duty to act upon; and that Senator or that Representative who fails to do so because he fears abuse or dreads calumny or hesitates to brave misrepresentation is no less a coward and a slacker than the soldier who deserts to the enemy on the battle line. When our country's policies are settled by law, then loyal citizens support these laws; but if no Senator may exercise his independent judgment as to what are the best laws to be enacted or what are the best plans to be followed, without subjecting himself to the charge of disloyalty, then this body has practically ceased to function and then, indeed, the liberties of our country are in deadly and imminent peril.

Mr. WALSH obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BAIRD] on account of death in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call discloses 52 Senators present, a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have understood that the main objection to the conference report now under consideration by the Senate arises by reason of the elimination of the language incorporated in the bill as it passed the Senate upon the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], namely, the language:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the liberty or impairing the right of any individual to publish or speak what is true, with good motives and for justifiable ends.

The Senator who last addressed the Senate [Mr. HARDWICK] discussed the bill as well in its general aspects as it was debated before the Senate when it was here in the first place for consideration. I address myself particularly to the language referred to, known as the France amendment.

It will be recalled by those who have followed the history of the bill that when the bill was before the Senate I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland and made a few remarks in support of it. I find no reason, however, in the attitude that I then took concerning this matter, to interpose any objection whatever to the adoption of the conference report with this language eliminated. I am entirely satisfied that this amendment has been given by some Senators an importance far beyond its deserts. I am entirely satisfied that in the practical operation of this statute it will receive substantially the same construction, whether that language is found in the act or not.

In the course of some remarks made by the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] on April 24, when the conference report was submitted to the Senate, he said:

On, Mr. President, what a travesty, it seems to me, to-day is presented when the Congress of the United States refuses to permit the people of the Union to speak what is true, with good motives and for justifiable ends, and denies the doctrine that has been the doctrine from time immemorial in this land—denies it, indeed, by its negative action and the elimination of this amendment—denies the right which ought to be the right of every American in time of war or in time of peace to speak the truth with good motives and for justifiable ends!

No such spectacle, however, is presented to the people of the United States. It will be remembered that the original act contained no such words of limitation, and the present act simply amplifies the original espionage act.

I regret that the Senator from California is not in his seat. I should like to advise him that in the trial of Max Eastman before the Federal court sitting in the city of New York, which, unfortunately, resulted in a mistrial, the defendant under the law as it now stands was permitted to deny from the witness stand that he was actuated by the criminal intent contemplated by the statute and that, on the contrary, he wrote what he did write with good motives and for justifiable ends; and he was permitted to go on and tell what his motives were and what the ends were which he sought to accomplish by the publication for which he was indicted. That, Mr. President, was in accordance with the very well recognized rule of law thus expressed in the seventh volume of the Encyclopedia of Evidence:

Except in Alabama the rule is now believed to be universal in the United States that whenever, in either civil or criminal cases, the intent of a person is relevant to the issue, or whenever the intent of a person in the doing of an act or in the uttering of a declaration becomes material, such person, whether a party to the cause or not, may testify directly as to what his intention was in the given instance.

Accordingly Mr. Eastman and, so far as I know, every man who has been indicted and tried under the act has been permitted, if he desired to do so, to go upon the stand and to assert that he did not have the criminal intent contemplated by the statute, but was, in fact, actuated by good motives and that the publication of the utterance was for justifiable ends which he could exploit. Then it became a question for the jury to say whether he was or was not actuated by such justifiable motives.

Mr. President, with a single exception, to which I will invite your attention directly, the criminal intent is an essential ingredient of every criminal act defined in the bill. Thus it is made criminal to "make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States." Next it is made criminal to "say or do anything * * * with intent to obstruct the sale by the United States of bonds or other securities." Observe the intent to bring that result about. Next it is made criminal in anyone who "shall willfully cause or attempt to cause or incite or attempt to incite insubordination" in the Army. The intent to do this is implied in the use of the word "willful" in the statute. It must be shown that that was his purpose, that that was his intent, and of course he is entitled to go upon the stand under the ruling to which I have invited your attention and deny that he had any such purpose, that he had any such intent, and he may go on and explain what his intent and purpose was and to show, if he can, that he was actuated by honorable and upright motives and that are justifiable under the law,

I skip now some of the language of the bill and proceed to that part which makes it criminal in anyone who "shall willfully utter, print, write, or publish any language intended to incite, provoke, or encourage resistance to the United States." Again you will observe the intent is an essential ingredient, and finally it is made criminal in anyone who "shall willfully advocate, favor, teach, defend, or suggest the doing of any of the acts or things" otherwise made criminal in the statute. The criminal intent is an essential ingredient in every one of the criminal acts defined except those thus grouped and defined—and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, contemptuous, or abusive language about the form of government of the United States, or the Constitution of the United States, or the military or naval forces of the United States, or the flag of the United States, or the uniform of the Army or Navy of the United States, or any language intended to bring the form of government of the United States, or the Constitution of the United States, or the military or naval forces of the United States, or the flag of the United States, or the uniform of the Army or Navy of the United States—

Shall be punished. There you will observe no intent need be established at all. If a man uses the language concerning any of these subjects, he is then amenable to prosecution under the act.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. Just a moment. Bear in mind the language must be first disloyal, or it must be profane, or it must be scurrilous, or it must be contemptuous, or it must be abusive, and it must be about, first, our form of Government; second, the Constitution of the United States; third, the armed forces of the United States; or, fourth, the uniform of the soldiers of the United States. I undertake to say that there is no man who can use language of that character about any one of those subjects who can say that he was actuated by pure motives and was seeking justifiable ends. Accordingly, the question of intent becomes entirely irrelevant, so far as that part of the act is concerned, and the language offered by the Senator from Maryland would not be available to the man because it would be impossible for him, as I view it, to establish that language of that character used with reference to any one of those four subjects was uttered with good motives and for justifiable ends. I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The language in the section just commented on by the Senator, as I recall the reading of it—I do not have the bill before me—is "whoever shall willfully advocate," and so forth.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to contend with reference to another section that the word "willfully" itself implied intent.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. If that is true as to the other section, then it would be true that the word "willfully" in the section commented on also implied or carried with it the intent.

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not think so; and the language will scarcely sustain that. "Willfully" is used there with reference to obstructing or inciting anyone; to one who shall willfully incite insubordination. You will observe that whatever he does must be done for the purpose of inciting insubordination; that is to say, he must have the intent insubordination which is implied in the word "willful." When you pass to the word "willful" down below, it simply qualifies what follows; that is to say, "utter, print, write, or publish." If he willfully utters it or prints it or publishes it, no matter what his motive may be, no matter what his intent may be, he becomes subject to the operation of the act.

Mr. REED. I understand the distinction the Senator draws. It seemed that the word "willful" implied the word "intent," but I see the Senator distinguishes according to the context.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; it does imply intent. In the second place it simply implies intent to publish. For instance, here is the owner of a newspaper. Without his knowledge at all, language is inserted in the newspaper which falls under the condemnation of this statute. While in a way he uttered it, he did not do it willfully and he would escape the punishment. The one who actually framed the language, and he alone, would be answerable and amenable to the law, unless indeed it was done with the knowledge of the owner of the paper. So far as intent is implied in "willful," it qualifies only the uttering and publishing.

Mr. REED. I understand the distinction the Senator makes. I am much obliged to him.

Mr. WALSH. So, Mr. President, I am entirely satisfied that however one might have felt about this language when it was presented as to whether it should be incorporated in the bill or should not be incorporated in it, there seems to be no reason why anyone should now decline to give his approbation to the conference report, that this much-needed law may speedily go into operation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. REED. I do not like to take the time of the Senate by calling for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. REED. I have not done so. I understand the Senator from Idaho desires to go on.

Mr. BORAH. When the Senator gets through.

Mr. REED. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hardwick	New	Simmons
Borah	Henderson	Norris	Smoot
Calder	Hollis	Nugent	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thomas
Curtis	Kenyon	Phelan	Tillman
Dillingham	King	Pittman	Townsend
Fall	Kirby	Poindexter	Trammell
Fernald	Knox	Pomerene	Underwood
Fletcher	Lenroot	Reed	Vardaman
France	Lodge	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Gallinger	McCumber	Shafroth	Walsh
Gore	McKellar	Sheppard	Warren
Gronna	McNary	Sherman	Williams
Gulon	Martin	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names on the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire briefly, I hope, to call attention to section 4 of the conference report, which reads as follows:

SEC. 4. When the United States is at war, the Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or concern is using the mails in violation of any of the provisions of this act, instruct the postmaster at any post office at which mail is received addressed to such person or concern to return to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed all letters or other matter so addressed, with the words "Mail to this address undeliverable under espionage act" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof, and all such letters or other matter so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the senders thereof under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

This amendment was offered at a very late hour in the consideration of the measure and passed the Senate without any considerable discussion, and I am of the opinion without any considerable consideration upon the part of very many Senators. I know that, so far as I am concerned, I did not give it the consideration which I have given it since the report has been returned to this body, and I did not understand the amendment at the time it was offered to have the effect which in my judgment it undoubtedly has.

When the espionage act was originally before the Senate division 12 contained three separate sections with reference to nonmailable matter. I thought at the time that those provisions were in themselves too arbitrary and drastic in their purport and sought to have them eliminated from the act, but the vote of the Senate was against it.

When this amendment to the espionage act came before the Senate I introduced an amendment to strike out those provisions from the law, believing that in view of the extended terms of the act, its more drastic features and provisions, there was sufficient protection against the use of the mails without establishing the arbitrary power of an ex parte hearing with reference to such matters. In other words, it seemed to me that if parties were punishable by fine and imprisonment for sending mail or for doing these several things it was not necessary to go further and to establish an ex parte tribunal where these matters were passed upon in another way, and in my judgment a way calculated to do injury to innocent people. But I ascertained that the Senate was not in harmony with that view, and I did not urge it. However, I am unable, Mr. President, to give my vote to this clause because in my judgment it goes much further than those measures against which I have stood from the beginning.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I simply wish to ask the Senator if he has noticed that the only change in the amendment as it passed the Senate made in the conference was to add the words "when the United States is at war" at the beginning of the section. That is the only change which was made.

Mr. BORAH. I am aware that the amendment in its substance is the same as it was when it passed the Senate, and as I said a moment ago we who followed the bill know that it came in at a time when the bill was about to be put upon its final passage. It was one of the last amendments offered. I can only speak for myself; I do not know what consideration others gave to it; but I did not myself give to it the consideration which I think it is entitled to have. I heard it read from the desk but did not have it before me.

Mr. President, it will be observed that, in the first instance, upon evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster General alone this exclusion is to take place. I am not about to criticize the present occupant of that office, because my objection to the measure has nothing to do with any individual. I assume that he would administer it as well as any other Postmaster General. But solely upon the action of the Postmaster General upon such evidence as satisfies him he may exclude this material from the mail. It will be observed that the law itself provides for nothing more than a purely ex parte hearing.

It is true, undoubtedly, that the Postmaster General could call in anyone whom he desired to hear in regard to it; but the law upon its face provides that upon any evidence, legal or otherwise, which is satisfactory to the Postmaster General, the mail matter shall be excluded from the mail and it not only covers——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is not the Senator stating that rather differently than the language of section 4, which he has just read, implies? It is not an exclusion technically; it is the return to the sender of certain matter referred to in the section.

Mr. BORAH. I accept the Senator's statement. I understood, however, that the fact of its return is the same in its practical effect as the exclusion from the mail.

It not only covers the individual action but that of any business concern, any printing establishment, etc. The act, in my judgment, is not confined to the exclusion of the particular mail matter which may be found objectionable, but an interpretation could very fairly be put upon it that upon a party being found guilty of having used the mails or attempted to use the mails for any specific mail matter, he could be denied the use of the mails at all thereafter at the option of the Postmaster General.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Does it not almost necessarily follow if the mail matter is seized the Postmaster General might determine whether it was proper or improper material in his view, and then he would be obliged to send it on or he would be obliged then, under the powers of this act, to reject it altogether and it would give him the right to reject mail directed to a person because that individual has offended against what he believes is the proper course of conduct?

Mr. BORAH. I think that is the logic of the measure, and I assume it was the intent to give the Postmaster General the power to say that any one who had attempted to mail nonmailable matter or disloyal matter of any kind should not have the use of the mails at all.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not contend that this is new or novel legislation?

Mr. BORAH. No; the principle is not novel; but I feel that the matter has gone further than it has ever been urged heretofore, because of the wide range of subjects covered.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator pardon me, though I dislike to take up his time?

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted.

Mr. KING. The section now under consideration, I will say, I am in part responsible for, and in drafting it previous legislation of Congress was followed. If I may be indulged for a moment, I will invite the attention of the Senator to one of the statutes which was employed very literally textually in the drafting of the provision which is under consideration. Some years ago there was passed a law, which is found in Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 496, which reads as follows:

The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him—

Employing the same language that is employed in the section under consideration—that any person or company—

It will be observed that it applies to persons as well as to corporations and associations—is engaged in conducting any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money, or of any real or personal property by lot, chance, or drawing of any kind, or that any person or company is conducting any other scheme or device for obtaining money or property of any kind through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, instruct postmasters at any post office at which registered letters arrive directed to any such person or company, or to the agent or representative of any such person or company, whether such agent or representative is acting as an individual or as a firm, bank, corporation, or association of any kind, to return all such registered letters to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed, with the word "Fraudulent" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof.

Subsequent legislation enlarged the provision of this statute so as to include all letters, all mail matter, addressed to the individual, firm, or association referred to in the previous part of the section. This matter came under review by the Supreme Court of the United States, and with reference to this particular language Mr. Justice Brown, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language:

It is contended, however, that the laws in question are unconstitutional in that they authorize the Postmaster General to seize and return to sender all letters addressed to a particular person, firm, or corporation which he is satisfied is making use of the mail for an illegal purpose. Their constitutionality is attacked upon three grounds: First, because they provide no judicial hearing upon the question of illegality; second, because they authorize the seizure of all letters without discriminating between those which may contain and those which may not contain prohibited matter; and, third, because they empower the Postmaster General to confiscate the money, or the representative of money, of the addressee, which has become his property by the depositing of the letter in the mails.

I will not take the time to inject in the Senator's speech——

Mr. BORAH. Is that the case of Ex parte Jackson?

Mr. KING. No; that is the case of Public Clearing House against Coyne, in One hundred and ninety-fourth United States. And after a review of the authorities and an exposition of the constitutional questions involved, the Supreme Court, Justice Peckham dissenting, affirmed the constitutionality of the act. They argued that by no means could the act be carried into effect and the beneficent purposes back of the act be effectuated other than by the administration of the law as in the statute laid down.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no doubt that Congress has the power to enact a law such as the court there passed upon, and I have no doubt that Congress has the power to enact this law; but the policy of it is the one question which I am interested in presenting.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact in reference to the policy, that there they were dealing with a specific matter; that is to say, the mails relating to a specific kind of transaction. That law, of itself, however, relating, as it does, to a specific class of matter, has been subject to a great deal of abuse. It has resulted in a great deal of wrong being done to citizens of the country. I know of some such instances within my own knowledge in time past, in the last 10 or 15 years. But how much more likely is it to work an injury to the citizen where it covers a vast field of literature such as is covered by the espionage act now? The Postmaster General is called upon to pass upon the question of abusive language, of disloyal language, of contemptuous language, or language calculated to incite opposition to the war. The entire field of literature practically with reference to the war is placed under the control of the Postmaster General by this section. You need no other provision than this to establish a complete and comprehensive censorship.

Now, I submit and I believe the Senator from Utah will agree with me, that upon those things men will honestly entertain different views, and particularly so if there is simply a hearing without an opportunity for the accused side to present their view of it.

I am perfectly willing to see the most drastic measures enacted by the Congress during this war for the punishment of disloyalty, whatever form it may take, and for the discouragement of propaganda against the war, whatever form it may take, provided the parties who are charged with the offense have an opportunity in the ordinary tribunals of the country to present their case, to pass in and out, guilty or innocent, according to the established tribunals of our land; but I could never bring myself to grant to any one man the power to pass upon the entire field of controversy, and to exclude from the mails anything which may appeal to him as being in violation of the law, without the publicity which accompanies a real trial and a real hearing in regard to the matter. It makes one man the sole judge of what constitutes aiding or discouraging the war, one man the sole judge of what is fair and just criticism and what is disloyal propaganda. He is not only the sole judge but he may condemn to utter obloquy a citizen without giving the citizen a right to be heard. He may destroy his business overnight, stop his publication, ruin his property without taking a scintilla of real probative evidence.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I shall yield in just a moment. I do not say that, I want to repeat, having in view any individual. It is too much power to give to a single individual to be exercised in that way, regardless of who the individual may be. I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I called the attention of the Senate earlier in the day to the point that the Senator from Idaho has just made. Since reading the bill it strikes me that it is not only the man who has violated this law and who the Postmaster General finds has violated this law that is penalized but it is also the man who writes a letter to him. His tailor could not send in his bill under the provisions of this proposed act, because all letters addressed to him are undelivered. It is the innocent man who may be punished just as much as the guilty man.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for that suggestion. I had noted that that was one of the objections to the bill. It not only reaches the man whom we are now discussing—the man who writes the letter—but it reaches his entire business connections, those with whom he may be dealing and those who wish to deal with him.

Mr. KNOX. And also his social relations.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that the matter he is discussing has already passed the Senate and gone to the other House; and, so far as the Senate is concerned, it is not in conference. It seems to me the only way to do would be to have another bill. If we should send the bill back to conference we could not have a conference on this amendment because the Senate has already acted on it.

Mr. BORAH. And does the Senator from North Carolina understand that, if the Senate should vote to reject this conference report after a consideration of it, that it would not be an instruction to our conferees?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not on this amendment. This amendment is not in controvery; it has already passed the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I presume there must be some way for the Senate of the United States to stop that after it has changed its mind.

Mr. OVERMAN. We might instruct the conferees to leave this out; but if we merely defeat the conference report, and send it back, we would be bound to insist in the conference on this amendment, because it has already passed the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. We might yield on it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; but the House has already agreed to it.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not make any difference.

Mr. OVERMAN. We can not yield unless the House should consent.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the whole conference report is open.

Mr. OVERMAN. The conference report is open; but we go back into conference on what?

Mr. LODGE. On every amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. But not on an amendment that the Senate has already agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. It does not make the slightest difference. The whole conference report will be rejected.

Mr. OVERMAN. We reject the whole bill?

Mr. LODGE. We reject the whole report and the conferees begin anew.

Mr. OVERMAN. How does it begin anew?

Mr. LODGE. Just as it was when the matter was first taken into conference.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I am asking; but this provision has been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate might recede, as the House has not passed it.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the conferees could not change the action of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. That is done all the time.

Mr. OVERMAN. The conferees can only act as to matters in controversy.

Mr. LODGE. That is in controversy. The House has not passed it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, we could strike out a part of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Idaho had yielded to me.

Mr. BORAH. I yielded to the Senator from North Carolina in order that he might state his position.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to understand this matter. If we again go to conference, we can not yield on something that the Senate has already adopted.

Mr. BORAH. I presume that we could certainly pass a resolution directing the conferees to do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I do not desire at this time to discuss the parliamentary situation; in fact, I do not think I should undertake to discuss it at all, for I am not sufficiently familiar with the practices of conferences between the two Houses to say what they can do or what they can not do. My observation, however, has been that they always do what they want to do, notwithstanding the rules of the Senate.

Now, I will go back to this section again in order that we may gather its true import. The section reads:

SEC. 4. The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or concern is using the mails in violation of any of the provision of this act, instruct the postmaster at any post office at which mail is received addressed to such person or concern to return to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed all letters or other matter so addressed, with the words "Mail to this address undeliverable under espionage act."

That would isolate the gentleman entirely from the business world. No one could write to him, and he could not write to anyone. Mr. President, that would be a very serious judgment to render against a man after he had been tried in a common-law court and convicted before a jury. Under this bill, with its wide scope of subjects and the numerous things about which these officials are called upon to pass, that would be a form of judgment which would be as severe as could be rendered this side of actual life imprisonment. It might mean not only the ruin of the man himself in a business way, but it might be of incalculable injury, perhaps, if it were certain kinds of concern, to the people who are seeking to do business with it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that one of the most effectual methods of destroying concerns that were engaged in lotteries or fraudulent schemes was to deny the right of those firms to receive letters of any kind, even letters, as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], from their tailors? In other words, to use the language of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], they were isolated; they were ostracized, so far as the Government could do so, and were denied communication, so far as the reception of letters was concerned, from any source—letters from a man's wife, letters from other persons upon innocent and harmless subjects. The mail could not be used by such a man or by such a concern for the purpose of receiving letters even of that character.

Mr. BORAH. That is true; but that was a concern which was engaged in an enterprise which was unlawful, which was in violation of law; and the concern itself was criminal; it was itself ostracized. Therefore it was denied the use of the mails at all for that enterprise. But here, Mr. President, might be a concern engaged in a perfectly legitimate business and in an enterprise which in no sense is subject to censure, but which might send a letter, or some representative of the firm might send a letter, or some member of the firm might send a letter wholly disconnected with the business, perhaps not concerned with the carrying on of the business, but containing the expression of some view which came under this act, and the concern, though it might be a perfectly legitimate concern, carrying on a legitimate business, would be ostracized or isolated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me an interruption?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. Under the provision of the section to which I invited the Senator's attention a few minutes ago, many corporations and firms were carrying on businesses which the Postmaster General thought were fraudulent. He instituted an investigation and determined, in his opinion, that they were fraudulent. I have no doubt that in some instances he came very close to the line, and that some businesses or undertakings which perhaps some people might not have regarded as being fraudulent were by the Postmaster General determined to be engaged in some fraudulent scheme or undertaking. Now, having so determined, without any adjudication by a court, he excluded their matter from the mails and then returned to the persons who sent letters to the particular corporation or firm the letters that were so mailed; and the Supreme Court of the United States has said that such legislation as that was not obnoxious to any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. The Supreme Court of the United States said just as the Senator contends; but in the ex parte Jackson case, I think it was, the court went on to say that if the provisions were so broad as actually to interfere with the freedom of the press it would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, let us assume that a large concern engaged in the business of publishing a newspaper publishes an editorial which comes under the provisions of the espionage act, and that the Postmaster General determines that that editorial is in violation of the act. It seems to me the Senator of the United States ought not to go on record in favor of a law which would give any man the right to say, upon an ex parte hearing, that for the publication of that editorial the paper should never again use the mails of the United States and thus reduce to ashes an absolute worthlessness hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property, or even perhaps millions of dollars' worth. Take a magazine. I know of instances where magazines for the last few months have been called upon to justify themselves before the department under this act, the Postmaster General having found that an article in a particular issue was objectionable. He could have said to the proprietor of a magazine, "You shall suspend; you shall publish no more, because you can not use the mails." Of course the magazine could be published and circulated individually or through the express companies, but it would mean the destruction of the enterprise.

So, Mr. President, here we are enacting a law which enables the Postmaster General to pass upon publications upon every phase practically of the war. We are enabling the Postmaster General to say what publications shall, in fact, take place, because the Senator knows that in the practical workings of the proposition the time will come when the newspapers which want to live will consult with the censor before they print. That has been the history of censorship from time immemorial, and that is one of its great evils.

I do not wish to be placed in the position—and I do not propose to be so placed intentionally—of permitting any man who actually publishes disloyal literature to escape punishment; but we have covered by this bill almost every conceivable form of publication and have assessed against the publisher, in case he is found guilty, a penitentiary sentence to the extent of 20 years and a fine of $10,000. I undertake to say that when there is a conviction establishing the fact that a man is disloyal and he is punished as is provided by the law, we will never have any trouble with that man again during this war; he will be out and over; there will be no difficulty in dealing with him; but if he is not guilty, if he is not subject to punishment by reason of conviction under the law of the land, he ought not to be punished so drastically by a sigle individual who may pass upon the question without arriving at the verity which belongs to a jury.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator is in error about the punishment. I will call his attention to the fact that the provision of the bill which he is discussing is simply an amendment to title 12 of the espionage law, which we passed in June last, and I wish to call the Senator's attention to the first section of that title, which reads:

SECTION 1. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

Now, coming down to section 3 of the same title, we find the punishment provided is as follows:

SEC. 3. Whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or Postal Service of the United States for the transmission of any matter declared by this title to be nonmailable shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

I leave it to the Senator to say, in view of the fact that this bill simply proposes to amend that part of the espionage law, whether the punishment could be any greater than that provided in Title XII of the espionage act?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Minnesota misunderstood me. When I was speaking of the punishment of 20 years in jail and a $10,000 fine, I was speaking of the punishment under the espionage act when the accused is convicted by a jury of an offense under that act; I was not speaking of the punishment of one who has undertaken to use the mails contrary to the provisions of the law. The Senator is correct in his construction of the statute with reference to that feature; but I ask the Senator from Minnesota to compare this section in its import, breadth, and inclusiveness with the sections which he has read. It goes a great deal further. Under the section the Senator has read the accused would be entitled, if he wanted it, to a hearing before a jury; he could finally force a trial upon that proposition; but under this bill the Postmaster General may not only exclude his mail upon any evidence satisfactory to him—and that is the end of it—but he may exclude the mail which is coming to him from any individual who wants to do business with him.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think so; I think the Senator is putting it too broadly, if he will allow me to interrupt him further——

Mr. BORAH. I am very glad to be interrupted by the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I think the language is not open to that construction. If the Senator will read the section under discussion, he will find that the Postmaster General can not exclude all mail coming to a person. If a man mails unpatriotic documents, disloyal documents, or writes a disloyal letter, such matter can be excluded from the mails; but if the Postmaster General excludes other mail he does so at his peril, and the man whose mail is excluded has a remedy.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think that because the Postmaster General finds that A has been guilty of mailing disloyal letters or documents, therefore he can exclude all the mail from A. I do not believe the section is open to that construction.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator's particular attention to the language, because I am satisfied the Senator would not be in favor of such a proposition, and if it does mean that, then I may rely upon the Senator's support to exclude it from the bill. Let me read this to the Senator:

SEC. 4. When the United States is at war the Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or concern is using the mails in violation of any of the provisions of this act, instruct the postmaster at any post office at which mail is received addressed to such person or concern to return to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed all letters or other matter so addressed—with the words "Mail to this address undeliverable under espionage act" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof, and all such letters or other matter so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the senders thereof under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

It might be a sermon—

If that language means what it says—and it will mean what it says and all it says when it is construed by the department; there will not be any trouble about that—all the mail directed to that address could be excluded.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I think that section should be construed in connection with section 1 of Title XII of the original espionage act, of which it is an amendment. It is plain that it is limited to that class of writings embraced in section 1 of Title XII. We should take that title as an entirety with this section added to it. When that is done it gives color to the whole act; and I think no court would hold otherwise than that the section under discussion would be covered by the rule laid down in section 1, Title XII, of the original act.

If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him further in this connection, as he knows the Senate agreed to the paragraph of the bill just as it is found in the bill. When we met in conference the House conferees agreed to it, and we were not in a position, as the Senator can well see, to strike it out or to modify it. I will simply say to the Senator that I had no intention of having the law go further than to exclude from the mails disloyal matter.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. NELSON. I would not have any other mail penalized. I do not think that power to exclude matter from the mails under fraud orders has ever been construed to authorize the department to go so far as to exclude all a man's mail, but only such mail as pertains to the fraud being perpetrated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not seeking to criticize the conferees. Of course, in dealing with this matter after it had passed the Senate, and the House had agreed to it, the conferees on the part of the Senate had but one thing to do; but now it is back in the Senate, and I should like to see an expression upon the part of the Senate which will enable the conferees to deal with it in a different way from the way in which they had to deal with it in the first instance.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in this connection would it be satisfactory to him if this section were limited to mail of the character to which reference has been made?

Mr. BORAH. If the section were limited to mail which is disloyal in character——

Mr. NELSON. Under section 1 of Title XII of the espionage law, for instance.

Mr. BORAH. It would not be satisfactory to me, because I am opposed to the proposition entirely; but I would not oppose it here in the Senate. I should not undertake to oppose the proposition if it should come back in that form, although I am utterly opposed to giving to any one individual the power to do what he may do under Title XII of the original act. I think it is too broad. It is a form of censorship. It enables one man to censor the whole expression of all the people. The Senator will recall that I opposed that provision when it was originally under consideration, but I would not, if it should come back to the Senate in that form, undertake to oppose its passage, because I know the Senate is in favor of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him further?

Mr. BORAH. I am very glad to have the Senator's view.

Mr. NELSON. Although there has been much criticism from many quarters—and I remember years ago that I received many letters from people who were hit—against what we commonly call the fraud-order law of Congess, I do not know how the Senator from Idaho feels about that; but I have always believed that the law has accomplished a wonderful amount of good. There are constantly in this country a lot of schemers who are trying to bunko and deceive the American people and who succeed to a greater or less extent. About the best protection we have ever had against them, so far as I know, is the fraud-order law under which the Post Office Department may act. I feel that I am taking too much of the time of the Senator, but I am anxious to stamp out disloyalty, and I think the United States mails ought not to be the vehicle of distributing disloyal and unpatriotic literature.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Is not the fatal defect of this particular section that it puts up to the Postmaster General to say what is and what is not disloyal; that is to say, it leaves to him the final limitation to be placed on the word "disloyal"?

Mr. NELSON. That is so in the case of fraud orders; and, if my recollection is right, we made the same rule in the case of what is called indecent literature. I think the question there was left to be decided by the Postmaster General.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there was not, nor could there be, anything political in its nature about the construction of that law, whereas there might be about the pending measure.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that mail matter which is disloyal or which teaches disloyalty or which is in furtherance of a propaganda against the prosecution of the war ought to be excluded; but I want a tribunal where the man charged with disloyalty and the man whose business is to be destroyed can have a hearing, where he can present his cause, and where he can be heard in a way which will insure that the decision which is to be arrived at will be fair. I want to know first that it is disloyal in a proper way, then exclude it. I do not think, Mr. President, when we are dealing with subject matter which covers the whole range of discussion with reference to the war, the whole field of controversy, and almost every conceivable phase of it, that it ought to be put up to any one man to determine the question upon an ex parte hearing.

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, I am not challenging or criticizing the Postmaster General individually. I want to put this discussion upon a different and higher plane. I think it is inherently wrong to vest such power in any man. It is not possible for a man to administer it, especially under the terms of this particular provision, without doing great injustice. I have seen magazines and articles excluded from the mails within the last few months in which I could not discover anything in the nature of disloyalty. I felt a great wrong was done some, and I feel that such arbitrary power is unnecessary.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. BORAH. I will in just a moment. In one instance I know of it meant absolute ruin to the man accused. He was denied the use of that for which the whole country is taxed; he was prevented from sending his material through that agency which the Government has provided for all our citizens. He lived 3,000 miles from the place where it was determined that he was disloyal.

Mr. President, that was not because the present Postmaster General passed upon the question; but an institution of that kind will result in such cases time and time again without any purpose or intent upon the part of the individual to do wrong. I do not think that we ought to pass this bill, with its broad terms covering almost every phase of human transactions with reference to the war, for when we have provided that, when convicted in a court before a jury, the guilty party shall be sent to the penitentiary for 20 years and may be fined $10,000, we ought in addition to put the citizen to another test to ascertain his loyalty when he may not be present to defend it.

Mr. President, the Anglo-Saxon race has been fighting battles and shedding its blood for a few of these fundamental rights for the last thousand years; and I have thought if we could carry this war through and preserve these great rights, such as habeas corpus, trial by jury, free speech, a free press, and free assembly, that I would not be very particular what other class of laws we passed, because if people may assemble and discuss questions freely and fairly, and may have their guilt or innocence determined by the precedents of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, it does not make much difference what kind of drastic laws may be enacted. When this war shall have ended we will be able to repeal all unwise measures. But if we put a censorship over the people of the country and deny them the right of free expression, the right of free speech, and the right of a hearing when they are charged with disloyalty, we are going to reduce them to such a state of mind that they will have no opinion to offer and no theories to advance with reference to their country when the time comes when we shall call upon them as part of the public opinion of this land.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if it will not disturb the Senator, I should like to ask him a question. Under this law as it is framed here it will be perfectly possible, will it not, for the Postmaster General to say that any criticisms that appeared in a newspaper, or that were made in a speech carried by the newspaper, which criticized our deplorable Postal Service constituted treason, were disloyal, were contemptuous, and he could shut the newspaper out of the mail on his own say that that was, in his opinion, bad?

Mr. BORAH. That is true.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see any escape from it. He can do that in the case of anything he thinks is disloyal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota has, I think, a very sound opinion with regard to what ought to be the law, but in connection with what he has said I want to ask the Senator from Idaho to explain this to me, which has bothered me from the beginning:

The purpose of this provision is to prevent the circulation of disloyal literature through the mail. Now, suppose that John Smith, of Washington, is found by the Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to him, to have been using the mail for sending out literature in violation of the espionage law. The next day a sealed letter comes to John Smith from some quarter. How is the Postmaster General to tell what that letter contains or whether or not there is anything disloyal in it?

Mr. BORAH. He does not, under this bill, assume that difficulty. If he has once determined that this person is sending through the channels of the Post Office Department mail that is disloyal, when the letter comes the next day it is sent back, regardless of its contents.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know; but the Senator from Minnesota thought that the proper interpretation of the law was that it would only exclude the disloyal literature. My question is, after the Postmaster General has found that this particular person has used the mail in violation of the law, and then a letter comes to him from some source or other, how is he to find out whether that particular letter is disloyal or otherwise?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, he can not find out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest that in order to make it perfectly clear that the construction of the Senator from Idaho with regard to the matter was correct, and that once the Postmaster General found that a particular person had been using the mail improperly, everything that came to him, no matter how innocent, must be returned to the sender, stamped as provided in this act.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that that is the view of the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I shall be very glad to have the support of the Senator from Minnesota for this measure with the construction placed upon it which I believe to be the correct one, and I could not afford to ask him to support the measure in its present form without explaining to him that in my opinion the interpretation which he has placed upon the bill is incorrect.

I think the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Iowa have correctly interpreted this section. I have no doubt that the section as drawn will prevent any person, firm, or corporation whose publications have been held to be disloyal by the Postmaster General from receiving any mail; not alone mail relating to and connected with the disloyal publication, but mail of an innocent character.

I might say in passing that the fraud statutes and the obscene-literature statutes, and others which I will not take the time to refer to now—and I am occupying the floor with the permission of the Senator from Idaho—contain the same provision, and though it was urged that letters of an innocent character might be thus excluded from the mail, the Supreme Court held that that was no reason why the validity of the act should be challenged. I might say further, in passing, that one of the principal objects of the statute that I read a few moments ago, and the reason why it gave such unlimited power to the Postmaster General to exclude all letters and other mail matter addressed to one engaged in the business denounced by the statute was that in a great many instances innocent people were induced to transmit money through the mails to these fraudulent concerns, and the only way to effectively deal with the question was to deny the use of the mail to the organizations referred to and return to individuals who mailed money orders or sent letters inclosing money their communications.

One of the things that we now have to meet arises from this fact: The Industrial Workers of the World and certain criminal socialistic and certain anarchistic organizations existing in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and a few other large cities, are sending out their poisonous and treasonable literature through the mail, and they are asking that remittances be made, by their readers or the public, to support such dangerous publications and aid in the criminal propaganda being carried on. Thousands of dollars are being sent to Mr. Haywood and to other leaders of the Industrial Workers of the World and to the leaders of criminal organizations not only by those who profess the same disloyal faith but by some who are ignorant of the wickedness of such organizations. The purpose of this section is to prevent those who are publishing these disloyal papers from receiving contributions. I am inclined to think that Congress has the power to order the confiscation of the money sent to these disloyal organizations, but it was felt when this section was offered that it was better to follow the precedent of former legislation and to stamp the letters sent to these organizations as nonmailable and have them returned to the senders.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we pass the measure which we reported to the Senate to-day with reference to the Industrial Workers of the World there will not be any Industrial Workers of the World organization left to send mail, if it is enforced at all. We have reported a bill which makes it a penal offense to even belong to such an organization, and have provided in the bill most drastic punishment for those who belong to such an organization. I was in favor of the measure, because I desire to do what I may to punish those who by force undertake to change our form of government or break down the war. I am perfectly willing to see those punished who are guilty of those offenses, but I do not want to vote for a measure which, in order to get some Industrial Workers of the World, will result in a great injury to people who are not Industrial Workers of the World and who are not to be classed with that kind of people who join criminal organizations. Any arbitrary law, or any law which is enforced in an arbitrary way, as this will be—I say "arbitrary" because it provides only for an ex parte hearing—will result, in my judgment, in a vast amount of injury to a great many innocent business institutions.

Mr. President, I think we are liable to go so far in this country in these questions of censorship and of discouraging discussion, and so forth, as to protect venality and corruption and profiteering and treason if it is sufficiently wise to come to Washington and offer to serve the Government and wrap a sufficient number of American flags around itself before it comes. We had this morning a discussion here in the Senate which must be humiliating to every loyal citizen, and I have no doubt it is humiliating and most annoying to the Commander in Chief, the President of the United States. It would seem that men have come here deliberately to Washington and put themselves in touch with a vast appropriation, who, through sheer incompetency, which amounts almost to criminality, or, indeed, to criminality, have not only gotten hold of the large appropriation which the taxpayers of the country must pay, but they have gone very far toward preventing the successful carrying on of this war.

Mr. President, there was a time when, under this espionage act, any man who would have written an article against the chief member of that board would have undoubtedly been sent to jail or denied the use of the mail. There was a time when, if the Aircraft Board had been assailed by the press of this country, that press would have been excluded from the mails of the country, honestly enough, no doubt, by the Postmaster General, at the time he acted; honestly enough, no doubt, by those who at that time were called upon to pass upon the facts. But unless you turn on the sunlight of publicity, you will find the creeping, crawling minions of corruption and incompetency in almost every department of the Government before this war closes. It has been so from time immemorial, that unless you have the utmost discussion of public questions, incompetency and venality and corruption burrow in about the pillars of the Government. It is just as much to the advantage of the President and to his administration as it is to the advantage of the balance of the country that those out of public place be permitted to discuss those who are in public place.

If this espionage act passes in its present form and the new Aircraft Board goes into power and somebody shortly after writes an article attacking the chief of the Aircraft Board, his publications can be excluded from the mail, and yet in six months from now—not reflecting upon the gentleman, because I do not know him—he may turn out to be wholly incompetent also.

I venture to say that if the public press of this country had felt perfectly free to come here to these departments and to investigate and to ferret out incompetency, a vast amount of this waste would not have occurred, and a vast amount of this incompetency would have been exposed before it loitered along here for a year and held this country a year behind in this movement of ours.

I do not believe in criticism for criticism's sake either in peace or in war. It is an unhappy and wholly fruitless way to wear out your life. Furthermore, no one need to fear unjust criticism; the sober and final judgment of the American people will sustain the man who is unfairly and unjustly assailed. It is only the weak, the incompetent, the dishonest who need fear the facts or who should seek shelter from the freedom of speech and of the press. The libeler, the slanderer, the unfair critic, the purveyor of false news will have short shift with the American people. If that were not true, our theory of government would be startlingly erroneous, for it all rests at last upon public opinion, and without a free press and free speech there can be no such thing as a sound public opinion. Sincere and fearless discussion is in the long run the aid of a competent and able administration.

I repeat I do not believe in, and the American people will not sustain, criticism for criticism's sake, and especially they will not sustain unjust and unfair assailment in time of war. Everyone who has his country's interest at heart will resolve all doubts in favor of the honesty and integrity of those in power. But when tens of thousands are conscripted for the Government service, taken from their homes and their health and their lives placed in chancery; when billions are being taken from the people in the way of taxes and expended by the people's agents; when war, which, while it arouses the nobler natures, also stimulates the mean and selfish; when the whole Nation, our liberties and our institutions are at stake, there should be no covering up of facts, for to cover them up is not to change them. There should be no suppression of news, no seal upon the lips of sincere and honest men simply because they may be out of office. In such times of all times the voice of the multitude should be heard, for the multitude must pay the taxes, must do the fighting and dying. The people as a whole can be trusted to be honest and fair with their public servants and loyal and patriotic to their country.

I do not mean to say I would not hold those who abuse the privileges of a free press and free speech responsible for such abuse. If I am not loyal and patriotic and abuse these privileges, I should go to jail. I would punish without limit those who by print or speech instigate sedition or crime of any nature. But I would never give to mere man the power to say in advance what others should print or what others should say when they address their countrymen. The one always results in concealing facts, suppressing truth, in fostering neglect, indifference to the public service, in shielding incompetency, treachery, and venality; the other brings forth the facts, stimulates public service, unifies and inspires the whole Nation—for secrecy has always been the prolific parent of suspicion and discontent, of injustice and fraud. A free press, as I have said, has its inconveniences and its evils, but without it the public service would soon become a hive of festering incompetence, a mass of stupidity. This is as true in time of war as in time of peace. War does not purify and purge the human soul of all its meanness, its littleness, nor make of incompetents competents. If it did, the Germans would be right and war should be the constant state of society.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have no purpose or desire, God knows, to deprive American citizens of their right of free speech, or of their right to write freely and criticize the Government. Nothing is further from my mind. But I have felt from the beginning, and I felt even before our country got into this war, that an insidious propaganda was being carried on in this country. Before we got into the war a large class of the American people were in one way or another poisoned, if I may use the expression—morally poisoned. We have gotten into the war now; and the same propaganda, though in a different manner, and not so methodically or from such high quarters as before, is still going on in this country.

So far as printed newspapers are concerned, it is easy for the Postmaster General to determine this question. Everyone can determine it. No mistake can be made. But the difficulty is when you come to sealed letters. Let me read section 2 of Title XII:

> Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, containing any matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States, is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

I take it that you will all agree with me that a letter of that kind sent through the mails is a dangerous sort of propaganda. Now, how can we reach that evil? We have no right under the law to open that letter. The men who are carrying on this propaganda in this country can carry on their villainous machinations to the very limit in sealed packages. Can any of you point out how to reach that in the case of sealed letters? If you read the law as it is, it is a blank letter. You can not tell, if the letter is written, whether it is a disloyal or an unpatriotic letter, and so this law proposes to leave it, in the first instance, to the Postmaster General.

Can you reach the evil in any other way, if you admit that it is an evil to send such disloyal mail—I mean, of the rankest kind—through the mail? If that is an evil that ought to be stopped, I wish some of you would suggest an appropriate remedy for it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in the case of a sealed letter how will the Postmaster General determine that it is disloyal?

Mr. NELSON. He will have to take his chances. If he makes a mistake he is liable.

Mr. BORAH. No; he is not.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; he is.

Mr. BORAH. No; under this law he could exclude from the mail a letter which I might write to my wife, and he would be perfectly immune from anything except physical responsibility.

Mr. NELSON. I do not agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is no doubt but that we authorize him to exclude this from the mail; and if he excludes it for any reason satisfactory to himself, as he is the judge—and we make him the judge—there is no way in the world by which we can hold him responsible. He excludes it, and we have told him to exclude it. Somebody undertakes to hold him responsible, and he says: "Well, here is the law. It authorizes me to do it. It was satisfactory to me."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Does the Senator believe in using the Post Office Department as a vehicle for carrying rankly disloyal mail?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not.

Mr. NELSON. How are you going to reach the evil, then? Can you prescribe a remedy that will not in some direction, perhaps, work an injustice?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly practical to pass a law by which you can discriminate and distinguish between the guilty and the innocent; and if you will provide a sufficient tribunal where the parties can be heard and where both sides of the question can be presented, nine times out of ten the guilty will be punished and the innocent will be protected.

Mr. NELSON. But would you not have to provide some system by which they could open a letter and determine what it contained?

Mr. BORAH. If you are going to go into first-class mail matter, that is true; but, Mr. President, it is not the first-class mail matter that is worrying me in this matter so much as it is the second-class mail matter. I do not want any man to say to me in advance, "You can not write this without my consent." There is a difference between refusing a man a privilege and holding him responsible if he abuses it. If I have to go to you and ask you what I shall write and what I shall print, I am an intellectual slave to begin with; I am a mere denizen of despotism. But if my Government says to me, "You shall print according to an established rule that is according to law, and when you print it you will take your chances before a court and a jury for doing wrong if you abuse it," that is a different question entirely.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that second-class matter is to a large extent open and aboveboard. I do not conceive that it is so necessary in that case to have any restriction. The greatest danger, the worst poison, to my mind, is conveyed in sealed letters, and that is what I should like to get at. If the Senator can suggest a remedy to reach that stuff, I should be very glad to have him point it out. As to second-class matter in the case of newspapers, that is an easy matter to determine; but in the case of letters you have either got to let the Postmaster General act on the best information and judgment he has, or else you have got to provide some system by which letters can be opened, either by the court or by the Postmaster General, to determine the matter; and you can not determine it in any other way.

Mr. BORAH. If the Postmaster General is not permitted to read a letter, and I am not permitted to read a letter, I think I am just as good a judge of the contents of that letter as he is. He is not permitted under this law to read that letter, and therefore he must exclude it upon some ground which would not be at all convincing to you or to me as to its contents. It is excluded upon some evidence which is unknown as probative evidence with reference to establishing a fact. We simply give him the authority to exclude first-class mail matter without first knowing at all what the contents are. Now, you can see the terrific injustice of that, and you can see also that in all probability you would not get the guilty fellow at all.

Mr. NELSON. Well, generally you do. If the Senator will allow me, take the case of the fraud order. I remember that years ago there was a kind of a bank established in St. Louis, and a paper published in connection with it, and that to my mind was clearly in its very make-up a fraudulent scheme. The Postmaster General had no right to open the letters addressed to that institution, and he did not, but, as a matter of fact, he debarred that stuff from the mail, and he did a lot of good by it. Some of the poor victims wrote to me and complained that the Postmaster General had interfered with their rights, but afterwards they wrote and expressed their thanks for what the Postmaster General had done in saving them.

Mr. BORAH. That is all right, Mr. President; but there was a specific institution engaging in a specific kind of a transaction which the whole world condemns, and that is fraud, and it had a character for fraud which was established, and their matter was excluded from the mail. But here is a newspaper which prints an editorial to-day which is nonmailable, which is in violation of the law. The Postmaster General under this law could prevent that newspaper from sending a sealed letter to-morrow to one of its customers.

Mr. NELSON. He can do it now, under this law, in the case of a newspaper; it is declared to be nonmailable.

Mr. BORAH. As to the newspaper, yes; but I say that after having looked at the editorial and determined that the editorial itself was disloyal, then he could go to the first-class mail matter and say that the party could not even send a letter, because he was denied the use of the mails, having once violated this law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not a very heavy punishment for disloyalty, after all, is it?

Mr. BORAH. No; but we have provided here for disloyalty. If the Senator from Mississippi will bear it in mind, we have already provided here for the punishment of disloyalty by a penalty, making it a penitentiary offense and subject to a $10,000 fine. Now, I shall not oppose a provision which will also exclude actually disloyal mail matter; but this provision goes so far as to enable the Postmaster General to say that a business institution, having violated this law with reference to an editorial, may not use the mails at all with reference to anything or for any purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. If I gather the idea of the Senator, I judge that if the proposed amendment excluded the first-class mail matter, that would meet his objection. In other words, the propaganda of which he spoke is carried on by letters. Why not confine this amendment to first-class mail matter? That will reach the class of disloyal people who are carrying on, and have been carrying on in past years, propaganda against the war and against the Government.

Mr. NELSON. Speaking for myself individually, and not as a member of the conference committee, I will say to the Senator that I would be perfectly satisfied with that; but I feel so earnest about this matter of disloyalty sent in sealed packages through the mail that I regard it as of more importance than the matter of suppressing fraud. Years ago we gave this drastic authority to the Postmaster General to stamp out fraud. I regard it as more important that we give power in some manner to stamp out this disloyal propaganda carried on by sealed letters; and I wish that the Senators who agree with me that such a propaganda ought to be stamped out would lay their heads together and provide amendments reaching it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say frankly to the Senator that if this amendment were confined to first-class mail matter, I would vote for it; but it goes further than that, and it goes just as far as the Senator from Idaho has stated that it goes. I do believe that there should be some power granted to stop this insidious lobby of disloyalty that has been going on in this country from the days before the declaration of war; and I believe that if this amendment were confined to first-class mail matter—and that is how it is carried on—it would break up that propaganda and that class of disloyalty.

Mr. KING. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me? I want to say to the Senator that I have in my office a bunch of letters that I received in the period just before the war. They are as disloyal and unpatriotic as any letters can be well imagined. They had a perfect right to go through the mail. It was bad enough then before we declared war, but it is still worse now when we are in the war to have such matter carried in the mail.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask my colleague a question, with his permission, to see if I understand his position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. In order to put it in a concrete way, I should like to call the Senator's attention to the publication known as The Masses. That publication has been sending out through the mail disloyal and treasonable matter. The Postmaster General excluded it from the mail. Appeals were made to the court, and the circuit court of appeals I understand has affirmed the action of the Postmaster General in excluding this poisonous, villainous, and disloyal paper from the mails. The editor of The Masses, Mr. Max Eastman, was indicted. The jury stood 9 to 3, as I am advised, in favor of his conviction. Three were for him. I have just received word that a number of Socialists and disloyalists are going to have a celebration soon to rejoice over the fact that he was not convicted. Does the Senator think we ought not to enact some legislation which would prevent, now that this paper is excluded from the mails, individuals from sending letters to The Masses, and using the Government agencies to transmit money to aid disloyalists in their efforts to continue a disloyal propaganda throughout the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if we included first-class mail matter, letters of the character named could not be sent to Max Eastman or anyone else if the Postmaster General thought they were disloyal and under this provision he would have power to open such letters, and he has the power to return them stamped as provided for in the amendment.

Mr. KING. The amendment merely provides if my colleague will indulge me that the Postmaster General, where he has satisfactory evidence that this criminal statute has been violated, he may then return to the senders of the letters their own communications, stamped as fraudulent.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether my colleague heard the statement that I made to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KING. I did not hear all of it, and that is the reason I interrogated my colleague.

Mr. SMOOT. I said I was willing to go as far as to exclude first-class mail matter in the amendment, but I did not want to go any further than that because I think it is most dangerous. I also said I believed the statement made by the Senator from Idaho was absolutely correct and that the authority granted under the proposed amendment gave to the Postmaster General all the power, and he could accomplish all the Senator from Idaho stated he could. I have stated as far as I would go as to the first-class mail matter; it is giving a power that was never given before, and I want to say that, of course, no one would think of giving it now unless we were in war. But if this propaganda of disloyalty can be broken up by extending it to first-class mail matter, I think perhaps that would be the best solution of the problem.

Mr. KING. If my colleague will still pardon me, he is in error if he says we have not heretofore given any authority to prevent the delivery of first-class mail matter to the mailee in cases of fraud.

Mr. SMOOT. What I meant by that was that the power was granted to the Postmaster General, that he should have the power upon his ipse dixit to say whether the matter should go back or whether it should not, without giving the party involved a right to appeal to the court, and this amendment does not give that right.

Mr. KING. If my colleague will still pardon me, there was nothing specifically stated, as I recall, in the act; but the court held that they had jurisdiction, and in this act, notwithstanding it is silent in respect to an appeal to the court, I have no doubt in the world but what the court would have jurisdiction to review the proceedings of the Postmaster General. Indeed, in the espionage act which we passed a few months ago and in which, as I recall, no reference was made to the courts and no machinery provided for appealing to the courts, nevertheless appeals have been made under the act to the courts, when it was averred that the Postmaster General had exercised arbitrary power or exceeded the power conferred upon him by the act.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask either the junior Senator or the senior Senator from Utah a question on that point, because my impression is that such an amendment as has been suggested by the junior Senator from Utah would make the amendment still more objectionable, from my point of view.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Iowa had better propound his question to the senior Senator from Utah instead of to me.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is confined to first-class mail matter, sealed mail matter, I assume it must be accompanied with authority to the Postmaster General or to any postmaster to open every letter that goes through his office. Otherwise your first-class mail matter would be subject to be returned to you unopened upon the mere suspicion that you possibly may have written a disloyal letter or a letter in violation of the law. How in the world would a postmaster or a Postmaster General act in the case if it were confined to sealed letters? It would simply put the whole country under suspicion? There could be no proof whatever of any offense without opening the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator that the amendment as it now stands refers to first-class mail matter and all other mail matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course it does.

Mr. SMOOT. So it can not have any other effect under the amendment as it now stands, and the evidence required by the Postmaster General is evidence satisfactory to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore it is limiting the power rather than extending it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly; but I am opposed to the amendment as a whole, and in my opinion the only safety in it lies in its application to second-class mail matter, open to everybody, the character of which can be known; but if you limit it to first-class matter then you have excluded that part which really may be judged fairly and with reasonable certainty, and you have restricted the Postmaster General to sealed letters, concerning which he can know nothing at all. His only guide would be in the character or reputation of the person who either sent them or the person to whom they were addressed. It seems to me you would be retaining all the objectionable features of the amendment and eliminating the rather unobjectionable features of it. I do not say that I would be willing that the Postmaster General or any postmaster should open every letter that passes through the office. We have reached a time now when there is no secrecy anyhow possible on the subject. But I hope the amendment will not be limited to first-class mail matter.

Mr. SMOOT. If we allow it to extend to second-class mail matter we include all papers, all magazines. Propaganda of disloyalty is very seldom carried on through second-class mail matter. If it is undertaken to be carried on with second-class mail matter it is open to all the world and is very quickly known, and if they are disloyal under the law to-day they can be handled. But it does seem to me if we include second-class mail matter in this amendment the power is given to the Postmaster General to open any mail matter upon evidence that will be satisfactory to him; and if that matter can be excluded from the mail, he can say whether any magazine or any paper in the country shall exist or not, and they will have no right whatever under this provision to appeal to any court in the land.

Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for five minutes,

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator to state that he did not expect to conclude his remarks this evening. Would he be willing to suspend that we may have an adjournment at this hour?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; I will do that at any time.

RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER and others. Make it 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that a recess be taken until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend by making it 12 o'clock.
Mr. OVERMAN. Very well, I accept the amendment.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that a recess be taken until to-morrow at noon.
The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, May 3, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 2, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.
The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:
Let Thy Spirit, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, descend upon us as the dew from heaven, to refresh and fructify our souls; that the meditations of our hearts, the words of our lips, and all our work may be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord our strength and our Redeemer; in His name. Amen.
The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. SWANSON, Mr. REED, and Mr. CURTIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SIGNAL BELLS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire, in view of the happening yesterday, when the signal bells were rung and did not sound in the other building, whether it might not be well that the bells might be tested again this morning to see if they are in working order without the necessity of making the point of no quorum?
The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper has already tested them.
Mr. WALSH. They have been tested twice. I think the third test ought to be made. In order to make sure, without the point of no quorum being made, I ask that the bells be tested a third time.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bells be tested the third time. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 10265, to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs, with Senate amendments, which just came over from the Senate.
The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill H. R. 10265, which the Clerk will report by title.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?
There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. CLARK of Florida, Mr. BURNETT, and Mr. AUSTIN.

CAPITOL POLICE.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?
Mr. SISSON. Reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman think he can get time under the five-minute rule?
Mr. SANFORD. I would much rather do it now. My purpose in asking for this time is to reply as briefly as I may to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] in general debate yesterday concerning my inaccuracy in some colloquy that I had with him some time since, and I think it involves facts that the House should know.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.
Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, in the course of general debate yesterday the ranking member of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], called the attention of the House to an inaccuracy in the conversation or colloquy that I had with him upon the floor of the House some time since. It seems, according to the RECORD, that I said, "The chief," referring to the chief of police, "tells us that he can use about 30 of the 100 policemen that he has." I must have used those exact words; I will concede that I did; but the facts that I should have stated, had I had an opportunity, perhaps will give the best idea of what the truth is.
In the first place, I want to thank the gentleman from Tennessee for the courteous manner in which he referred to me and for acquitting me of any intention to misstate the facts. During the war session of Congress the Committee on Accounts had before it a resolution to appoint 50 extra policemen. At that time we called before us the captain of police, Capt. M. B. Louthan, who appears to me to be a very intelligent person, actuated by a desire to render good public service. He came before our committee and told us the facts about the police department of this Capitol.
In order to be sure that my recollection is correct, I talked to Capt. Louthan this morning, and what he says to me this morning, which I know to be the truth, is exactly what he said to the committee in the extra session of Congress, and those facts are these: The police department that guards this Capitol is run under the patronage system, and perhaps that is enough to condemn it. He says that men are put on the force whom Senators and Members of Congress bring on from their States and districts. He says the system is that the patronage committee of the majority gives to each Member of the majority a certain share of patronage, and some Members of the majority take their patronage in the form of a policeman, and whoever that person is whom the Member of Congress brings on gets his place on the force. In other words, the captain of police, who has the responsibility of keeping the service right, has no discretion in the selection of the men who will render that service.
He told us at that time, and he tells me again this morning, that 30 per cent of the force are absolutely inefficient. That is probably where I got the figure 30. He did not say 30 men, but he said 30 per cent of the men are absolutely inefficient. A number of the policemen are students in the schools in Washington. A large number of them are old men, who may know something about the duties of policemen, but who have not the physical ability to act as policemen. He said then, and he says now, that a large number of the force are entirely unacquainted with the duties of policemen. He says they do not know how to make an arrest, nor are they capable of judging of the circumstances which would require an arrest, and that a large number are physically incapable of performing the duties of their office. He said to me then, and he says now, that he himself is a product of the patronage system. Therefore, I do want to concede that the patronage system can produce one clear-minded and efficient individual. He must be an accident. He impressed me as honest and sincere. He appears to me from his statement to be very anxious with reference to the efficiency of the police force that has the duty of guarding this Capitol. Just recently, in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, there has appeared a provision to appoint 50 more policemen in the same fashion. The Senate Rules Committee, apparently recognizing the inefficiency of this system, has agreed of its own motion that no Senator will recommend any of those extra policemen for the force, and they have passed a rule that Capt. Louthan shall have a free hand to select men capable of performing this duty. The House has taken no such action.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——
Mr. SANFORD. I should like to finish what I have to say, but I will yield for a moment.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In fairness to the captain I want to ask whether this was a voluntary statement or an involuntary one?
Mr. SANFORD. I am very glad to say that the statement was given by the captain eagerly and willingly, both to the committee and to me this morning, because he seems to be actuated by a desire to get this thing right. I need not say to the intelligent men who make up the body of this House that the guarding of this Capitol during this war is one of the most sacred trusts that is in our hands. I know of no place in America where our enemy could strike with such satisfaction to himself and with such hurt to the feelings of the American people as he would if his agents were to practice sabotage on this precious specimen of American architecture.
Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. COX. How is the captain of police appointed?

Mr. SANFORD. By the patronage system.

Mr. COX. Who is responsible for him?

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman of your caucus who happens to have the captain assigned to him as his share.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know where the captain is from?

Mr. SANFORD. No; I do not know anything about his personality except as he revealed it to me. He has an honest face and a plain-spoken manner.

Mr. COX. I think that the criticism of bringing men here and putting them on the police force and letting them go down to a university or school is absolutely a just and wise criticism.

Mr. SANFORD. Judging, therefore, by the importance of the work that this police department has to do—to guard this Capitol—I believe I am justified in taking these few minutes in correcting a misunderstanding with reference to my exact words and to use that inaccuracy, if I was guilty of it, as an excuse for pressing upon the minds and consciences of the majority of this House the seriousness of the duty that confronts them. After this testimony was given in the extra session of Congress, the resolution for 50 extra policemen disappeared. It was wisely tabled, but now the Appropriations Committee brings it in again in the form of an amendment that was put in in the Senate, and the House has now adopted and put itself on record for continuing this system. We all know that 20, 30, or 40 years ago, in all the cities of America, the police department was the prey of politicians. It was so in the old days. I venture the statement that to-day in no city of America is the police department considered as the spoils for politicians. This House of Representatives is the last place where it remains. The civil-service system has prevailed everywhere except here. This is the last stronghold of the spoils system. I have never been in any way associated with the reforms of the civil service, but I think I can say with safety that in no place has the civil service worked so advantageously as in the management of police departments. It has been a relief to have the police departments of our different cities freed from the influence of the spoils system. Instead of the scandal, corruption, and inefficiency that prevailed under the spoils system, we have now in our cities a method by which order can be maintained and the dignity of the city preserved. I have a hope that in view of this revelation of facts, which nobody can dispute, the House may be willing to organize, for the management of the police department of the Capitol, a civil-service system. It would not require much effort. It would require only a willingness to abandon the spoils system. I realize that in the way of such a reform stands the desire of men who want this $1,000 a year or so of patronage. I do not think there is any danger of becoming too serious about a matter of this kind. When one goes through this country to-day and hears the appeals that are made to men, women, and children to buy $50 liberty bonds to preserve the things that are worth preserving and that are worth fighting for, can it be possible that as the representatives of those same people we have acquired nothing of the spirit in which they are fighting and pleading? I hope, I believe, that such is not the case. [Applause.]

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 10613. An act to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse of the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the conference report on H. R. 3132 that was presented day before yesterday, but incorrectly printed yesterday and reprinted this morning. It is what is known as the Raker naturalization bill. I want to call it up to-morrow for the action of this House. The bill as agreed on by the conferees has now been printed in full, and I would be very glad if gentlemen would give careful consideration to it. It is most important. It involves the interests of aliens who have volunteered and gone over in our armies and are liable to die and leave their families here without naturalization or the civil or political rights of naturalized citizens. I would be glad, in order to expedite the consideration of it to-morrow, when I shall ask to take it up, if gentlemen will refer to the RECORD, page 5996, and give it some consideration.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Has the bill been printed in the form which corresponds to references in the conference report and statement?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know; the bill has been printed in full.

Mr. ROGERS. And it is obtainable at the document room?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the naval appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of dry docks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of dry docks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District appropriation bill (H. R. 11692).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read the paragraph beginning on line 15, page 2.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On yesterday at the other end of the Capitol one of the Senators inserted in the RECORD a letter from the War Department touching the right of soldiers to vote in primary and general elections. In the discussion surrounding the introduction of that letter the impression was created in the Senate, and doubtless created throughout the country—because I notice that the junior Senator from Mississippi stated that he "had requested the press to copy the letter and send it broadcast throughout the country." In my own State, under the law, these soldiers and sailors who to-day are fighting in the cause of their country, whether they be in the United States, in France, or elsewhere, are permitted to vote. Under that law on next Monday the ballots, with each candidate's name thereon, will be printed and mailed to every Mississippi soldier and sailor, wherever they may be. Under that law their names may be furnished by the candidates, by their friends, by the soldier or sailor himself, and I am not willing that such an impression go abroad that would have a tendency to influence any soldier or sailor, or any of their friends, from presenting their names to the election authorities in the various counties of my State that these boys may vote. I can understand how any friend of any one of these soldiers who may be to-day in France on reading what happened in the Senate yesterday might conclude that it would be unnecessary and useless to present his friend's name to the executive committee and request a ballot to be sent him, because they would naturally conclude that under the law they would not be permitted to vote. It is to remove such an impression in my State and in other States of this Union where the conditions are similar that I have arisen to address the House to-day.

Some days ago I received from the War Department a similar letter to the one that was incorporated in the RECORD on yesterday, but when I first read it I felt sure that those regulations were promulgated because of laws in some States quite different from the election laws in my State and perhaps other States of the Union; so I went to the War Department and conferred with the officials there and told them that in Mississippi and other States with similar laws that to allow them to vote in France or elsewhere could not possibly cause a disarrangement in the camps or in the trenches; that it could not possibly cause any inconvenience, any worry, or demand any of the officers' time or attention in camp or field. I explained to them that under the law in my State, and I had no doubt that it existed in other States, that it was only necessary, when the soldier received his printed ballot, for him to sign his name and place a cross mark opposite the name of the candidate for whom he desired to vote, seal his ballot in an envelope, address and mail it to the election authorities in the county from which he came. It would not be necessary to have managers appointed, booths provided, and tally sheets prepared in order to hold the election, but that a simple and fair way had been provided that if the soldier was in France he could vote the same as he could write a letter and mail it back home; that he could perform this function of citizenship in the trenches, in his tent, or on the training grounds. To this the department informed me that under that system they had no objection in the world to the soldiers in France or elsewhere voting.

I am quite sure, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that so far as the soldiers of Mississippi are concerned who are now or will be on foreign soil, they will be permitted to vote. [Applause.] And I can not see for the life of me why they should not be entitled to vote. The legislature of my State drafted the law in order to avoid the cumbersome system of providing ordinary election machinery—to avoid, if you please, the very thing against which the War Department complained. I congratulate the legislature of my State on the simple yet very fair method they have provided that permits these splendid soldier and sailor boys the right to express their sentiments touching candidates for public office. If there be one class of citizenship who should be entitled at this time to vote over any other class, it is the fighting forces of the country. For four years and more delicate international questions have arisen in this House and at the other end of the Capitol. They have presented questions about which some of us have differed—questions that went to the right of our citizens to travel the high seas; the right of our citizens to ship their products abroad; the protection of their lives and property; and an indorsement of America's attitude or Germany's attitude on many international policies. These boys who are to-day fighting for the causes that America stood for, and about which men in this House and in the Senate either voted for or against, championed or opposed, are certainly, above all other citizens, entitled to either condemn or indorse. Who would have a greater interest in the character of Representatives who are to make the laws for an army and its government—the soldiers who are fighting, who are defending the country, or the civilian population of the country? Is it not perfectly natural to presume that the soldier who is risking his life and his all is vitally interested in having men represent his Government who indorse the policies for which he is fighting and whose ideas of prosecuting the war are in sympathy with his?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I understand the gentleman to say that the soldiers in France will be permitted to vote.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I think they should be, of course, but the last paragraph of the letter to which the gentleman refers——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That is exactly the reason that I make these remarks.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Says that they will not be. Of course it would be an outrage if the soldiers and sailors are not permitted to vote. They are performing the highest possible patriotic service, and all their rights and privileges should be protected.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman is absolutely right. The latter part of the letter the gentleman alludes to was no doubt the action of the War Department, based on the supposition that all of the States provided under their laws that some election machinery must be employed for holding the election, and because of the inconvenience it would naturally work the department evidently thought it might not be practical in France, but they very clearly make exceptions, as I have stated before, to the soldiers and sailors in France or elsewhere being allowed to vote when this cumbersome election machinery is not employed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Then, in the gentleman's opinion, the Mississippi soldiers will be permitted to vote?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. They certainly will; and I hope the friends of these boys who are now fighting for the glorious cause of this country will see to it that complete lists in every county in Mississippi are furnished to the executive committees of those counties on next Monday that these printed ballots containing the names of the candidates for whom they may vote may be sent to them, wherever they may be, so that they can express their approval or disapproval of the candidacies of various men. I very sincerely hope that they will not get the impression from what appeared in the RECORD this morning that they, even though to-morrow they should embark for France, will be cut off from voting in the coming election.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. The Acting Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, four or five days ago sent to a Massachusetts legislative committee, which is considering this general question of soldiers voting, a long letter in which he argued very elaborately as to the impracticability of allowing the soldiers to vote in France. In view of what the gentleman says, does he mean the House to infer that the War Department has changed its viewpoint since that letter of Mr. Crowell's was written?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I certainly have been unfortunate in the language that I employed if the gentleman has failed to understand me. I stated that where blanks are furnished and sent to the soldiers, and all they have to do under the State law in order to vote is to sign the blank ballot just as they would sign a letter written to their home folks and put a cross mark opposite the name of the candidate for whom they desire to vote, the War Department would have no objection to it. This information came to me not for the first time this morning. I gathered it several weeks ago when I first investigated the question. I want to say, however, to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is my opinion that the department does not look with favor, and does not desire, that the soldiers in France or on other foreign soil should vote where under the laws of a State certain election machinery must be provided, such as managers and bailiffs and booths in order for the election to be legally held. The letter does say that "the department has reached the decision that their vote can not be taken without serious interference with military efficiency."

Mr. BORLAND. Has the gentleman an official statement from the War Department to that position?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I have such an official statement that satisfies me absolutely on the proposition. I conferred personally with them. I went there especially to see them about this matter, and thoroughly satisfied myself that so far as my own State is concerned, under the laws of that State permitting these sailors and soldiers to vote, that they will be permitted to vote, whether they are in France or elsewhere. I was told this morning that an opinion similar to the statement that I am now making to the House was given to some Member of Congress from North Carolina.

Mr. BORLAND. The official statements seem to be otherwise, and it would be very desirable to have an official statement to the effect of what the gentleman says.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I have addressed myself to this subject to-day because these names should be furnished to the various committees in my State by next Monday, and I want to cure at this time any impression that might go out from the discussion in the Senate on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, light, power, repairs, laundry, mechanics, and labor, not to exceed $3,500, and miscellaneous supplies, $23,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. About three months ago I called the attention of the House to the condition of the Armenian and Bagdad fronts and suggested at that time that a little aid financially from the allies would enable the Armenians and the Georgians to raise a couple of hundred thousand men and defeat the Turks on the Armenian front and join hands with the British Army from Bagdad. If the gentlemen have followed the dispatches, they will find that the suggestions I made as to what would happen have to a great extent happened, except that we have not assisted them financially. I want to further suggest now that if we had done so they would be much better off than they are, and that what I stated they would attempt they have attempted. I speak of this now because the dispatches state within the last day or two that the British Army has begun a well-prepared advance from the Bagdad front for Mosul. It is about 150 miles from Bagdad to Mosul. The English hold Bagdad, as you know, as they have for some time, and have advanced about three-fifths of the distance now toward Mosul, up the Tigris. Mosul is a city of 100,000 population or more and is the last Turkish stronghold in that section of Turkey. I think I am safe in saying to the House that within a short time the British Army will probably take Mosul and destroy the Turkish defense in that part of the Empire of Turkey. Very likely, from what I can learn, the Turkish Army at that point is not so strong as it might be, and the English advance is so determined that it will probably reach Mosul within a reasonably short time. What I wanted to call the attention of the House to at this moment is that when they have reached Mosul they are within about 150 miles of the city of Van in Turkish Armenia. At the time I spoke the Armenians held Van, on the 6th of February, which they had taken from the Turks under Russian auspices but with their own men and officers. The Russian troops drew out of Turkish Armenia and entered Russian Armenia. They assailed the Georgians at Batum, from which the railroad runs to Tiflis and Boku. You know the bolsheviki ceded Russian Armenia to Turkey, and they proceeded to take possession, which I ventured to prophesy would occur when I spoke in February. Abandoned by Russia Armenians and Georgians organized a government of their own at Tiflis and began a stand of their own. The Turks took Erzerum, Van, and all Turkish Armenia, including Trebizond.

As I said then they would, the Armenians then proceeded to organize themselves without Russian aid and to build up an army and assail the Turks again. They are marched into Turkish Armenia and have retaken Erzerum and Van, and the Armenians now hold the city of Van, about 150 miles across the valleys and mountains from Mosul. When the British Army is in Mosul, which I hope and anticipate will be soon, it will be within about 150 miles of the Armenian troops in Van. There will be practically no force to divide them, and when it happens, if my opinion and judgment are correct, you will see the Armenians and the English quickly united, or at least in touch, and the two armies will be then within a striking distance of each other, and you will see the front extended from Bagdad up to the Caucasus. They will advance toward Alexandretta, on the Mediterranean.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does the gentleman know how many soldiers the English have there?

Mr. LITTLE. No; I do not know. I can not give the number. They have brought from India a very considerable army, and it is maintained from Bombay.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does the gentleman know how many they have in Mesopotamia?

Mr. LITTLE. That is Mesopotamia.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. And Greece?

Mr. LITTLE. They have no soldiers in Greece except at Salonica.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does the gentleman know how many?

Mr. LITTLE. No; I do not. The allies have several hundred thousand at Salonica and in that vicinity, but the exact number I do not know. The natural difficulties in the way of an advance from Salonica are much greater than from Mosul, and the Huns have stronger forces before Salonica than before Armenia.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. They have quite a large army in Mesopotamia?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; they have a large army; they have a sufficiently large army, but I can not give the exact figures on the Turkish front of Mesopotamia; but I feel safe in prophesying that they will take Mosul and join hands with the Armenians at Van if no unexpected circumstances arise. Now, when that is done you have a line from Bagdad clear to the Caucasus and Tiflis, a united effort.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. As I said before, the Armenians have raised a large army in the Caucasus and are fighting the Turks. The Turks have within a few days taken from the Armenians the city of Kars, a large Russian-Armenian city. I can say to the committee the Armenians raised an army of about 50,000 men to fight at Kars the Turks, who have a larger force, and have it better organized and with Germans behind them. The Turks have been able to take Kars since the time I spoke here about three months ago. If the suggestion I then had the honor to make had been adopted at that time and the United States or our allies had extended financial assistance and encouragement to the Armenians, the Armenian force of 50,000 at Kars would have been big enough and well organized enough so that the Turks would not have taken that city. The chance is still there. The British will probably be able to join the Armenians and control the Caucasus. If our Government will extend now to the Armenians and the Georgians financial assistance, which we have frequently extended elsewhere, in the next three months we may see the Armenians so organized that they will not only keep Van, but they will effectively join with the English from Bagdad and then retake Kars and perhaps start on the road to Constantinople with the English, which I think would be the road to Berlin. We can put 200,000 men in arms against the Turks on the Armenian front with less money than we can raise such a force at home and still have our own soldiers. Our allies there will not go against the German trenches. We will fight them on their weakest side. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have some information that I think may interest the committee, directly in line with the speech made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I wonder if the gentleman would withhold the enforcement of his rule in that case.

Mr. SISSON. I will have to object, because I want to try to get the bill along. It is absolutely necessary that these appropriation bills get through.

Mr. ROGERS. This is an extremely live matter.

Mr. SISSON. That is very true; but I will state to the gentleman here that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] had control of two hours in general debate, which we agreed upon, and that the two hours were not taken up on that side on yesterday.

Mr. ROGERS. Is not that good reason for using the time now, if it was not used before?

Mr. SISSON. The man who had the time did not take it. Therefore I want to state, in all courtesy and consideration to every Member of the House, that I am going to object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss fuel, the item just reached.

Mr. DYER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. I would like to know where we were reading when we stopped for the discussion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We were on page 4, line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. On the paragraph on page 4, ending with line 14.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I have five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman made a parliamentary inquiry, and the Chair responded to it.

Mr. DYER. I asked the question for the purpose of making a point of order if the gentleman does not speak to the bill itself.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for his gentlemanly way of making a threat. The gentleman has been in the House a long while, and knows how to do that. I say to him, in all candor, there was no provocation for his suggestion. If the gentleman is going to be the guardian——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will proceed in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I said I wanted to discuss fuel, and I will adhere strictly to that point. May I ask how much time I have? On account of the interruption of the gentleman from Missouri I fear I have lost some.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The increase of smoke in the District of Columbia has attracted some attention. Those who observe the belching chimneys of the city, which hitherto has not been a great industrial center, have feared that much damage will be done to the architectural beauty of the Capital. In order that this matter might be brought to the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I introduced a bill a few days ago, asking that some inquiry be made with the view of arresting the smoke or, at least, to reduce its volume without prejudice to the industries concerned.

Residents of Washington who are interested in the symmetry and beauty of the buildings here have been pleased that some effort is being made to draw attention to what may become a very great nuisance before the summer is over.

Amongst others who have written is one who suggests that possibly it may not be the use of soft coal in particular, or of oil, or other fuels, that is entirely responsible for the trouble. It is suggested in this letter that some of this smoke belching from the smokestacks may be due to the excess of pipes, cigars, and cigarettes that are used by employees in the various departments, contrary to the rules, during office hours. One gentleman, an employee of one of the departments, tells me that in the building where he is employed 80 per cent of those in uniform, as well as those not in uniform, during office hours, while men and women come and go upon public business, openly practice the pipe habit, or the cigar or cigarette habit. That would not be permitted in the office of any ordinary business man. It is not permitted in warehouses. There are signs up on our new munition establishments and executive offices in Washington now forbidding smoking. We used to complain of the word "verboten," which had something to do with the war in Europe, but the word "forbidden," so far as smoking goes in the departments in Washington, seems now to be held in as much contempt as some of us would treat the German word "verboten." One correspondent tells me that in the last month he put out three fires in one department building in Washington due to the careless throwing away of cigarette stumps, lighted and thrown negligently into rubbish heaps.

But that is only one part of the smoke nuisance. We will hear more about it during the coming summer. There are two great smokestacks over yonder at the Capitol power house which cover the Capitol with smoke, and which send their fumes into the House Office Building. That is calculated to keep the window cleaners and the charwomen on the job constantly. I presume that will interest us during the hot weather.

Mr. Chairman, I am making this brief talk in order that official Washington, and particularly architectural Washington, may take notice. I see it affects my friend from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who kindly passes a cigarette so that I may close on time. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Auditor's office: Auditor, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,250; bookkeeper, $1,800; accountant, $1,500; clerks—three at $1,600 each, three at $1,400 each, one $1,350, four at $1,200 each, seven at $1,000 each, one $936, two at $900 each, two at $720 each; messenger, $600; property survey officer, $1,800; disbursing officer, $3,000; deputy disbursing officer, $1,600; clerks—two at $1,200 each, two at $1,000 each, one $900; messenger, $600; in all, $48,776.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Has the reading of the paragraph been concluded?

The CHAIRMAN. It has just been concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in line 12, I move to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,500." And in that connection I wish to say——

Mr. SISSON. I wish to reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish to say that I do not know this particular clerk, but I am quite familiar with his work. During the last few years I have had a great deal of communication with him, particularly through the accountant for the District of Columbia, and that work has shown beyond all sort of doubt that he is a most competent fellow—that he is really doing the main work in the auditor's office—and I believe that his salary ought to be increased very much more than $250. I hope that the point of order will not be insisted upon, but that this man's salary may be increased at least to the extent of $250. I think he is worth many times that to the District of Columbia, and I would be very glad indeed to see the amendment adopted.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman submit to an inquiry?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Has the clerk asked for an increase?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He has not asked me for it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a statement here that I hope will be accepted as the policy of the committee with reference to all of these salaries.

Your committee did not increase any of the higher salaries in the District of Columbia. The commissioners estimated for this $250 increase, but we agreed generally that none of the salaries of the officers and employees of the Government of $2,000 and over should be increased, because we felt that this was not the time to increase salaries. For that reason we made that rule, with only one exception that I know of, and that was where an employee did a great deal of work at night in connection with the selective draft, and we did not then give all that was asked for.

For that reason alone I shall be compelled to make the point of order, notwithstanding the fact that all the gentleman says about this particular employee is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintenance, repairs, fuel, lighting, fitting up buildings, lunchroom equipment; purchase, exchange, and maintenance of bicycles and motor delivery vehicles; and other contingent expenses, $11,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]? The purchase of coal is provided for all through this bill, and I would like to get some information as to just how the District is being supplied at this time. Soft coal, as I understand, is being used almost exclusively in public buildings.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman understands, of course, the coal situation in the District of Columbia was very acute during the winter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I do.

Mr. SISSON. And for that reason the official activities of the District, as well as of the hotels and private citizens, were permitted to use any such coal as they could get. The District commissioners, of course, make a contract for coal for the District, and the various institution, like the schools and the District Building and all the other official activities, are provided for, and the District commissioners during the winter were compelled to resort to all sorts of means of getting coal. For example, many of the teams of the District of Columbia which would be used in other departments of the government were converted into coal wagons, so that they might deliver coal to people who absolutely needed it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was a hand-to-mouth proposition?

Mr. SISSON. Practically a hand-to-mouth proposition, and they took just such coal as they could get.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mostly soft coal?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. What the gentleman spoke of a moment ago will perhaps be to a certain extent true, because the demand for hard coal in the Navy is going to be so great that the chances are that in all the activities in the United States they will probably use the soft coal in preference to the hard coal, which will be used freely in the Navy. Also you will understand that a great deal of coal is being stored up by the Navy for future use in the Navy as a precautionary measure. Of course, if the war should end that coal would be released and put upon the market, and there would be no sort of trouble in getting what sort of coal you wanted to use. Heretofore they have used the West Virginia and Pennsylvania hard coal, which does not produce so much smoke, gas, and ashes, but the use of coal during the winter has been just such coal as the commissioners could get.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. The gentleman has stated the case very clearly. What I wanted to get at is whether any arrangements are being made for storing coal for District use for next winter?

Mr. SISSON. The statement I make is rather private and tentative, and I would not like to be held to too strict an accountability for it; but the District Commissioners are now making arrangements to get coal enough to carry them through the winter as soon as they can get transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal is being used now to bring coal to the city?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know to what extent, because I do not think they have many coal barges. They are using that canal for the transportation of stone and hay.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the District officials have been before the Director General of Railroads, and that he is inclined to encourage the canal for that purpose.

Mr. SISSON. That may be. The gentleman may possibly have this in mind: There is an estimate in the sundry civil bill, which is now pending before the Committee on Appropriations, looking to the establishment of a coal yard.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. SISSON. That is in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There was a proposition here before the coal famine of last winter to establish a municipal coal yard.

Mr. SISSON. As I understand it they propose to establish a coal yard for all of the governmental activities in the District of Columbia, and for coal for the District itself, for the purpose of taking care of the local situation here at the one coal yard.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the plan, as the gentleman understands it, now contemplate any relief for the residents of the District of Columbia, apart from the governmental departments?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. Of course, the relief of the one would be the relief of the other of necessity; but I understand that the coal yard will be used so that in the event that the residents themselves do not have coal, if there is coal sufficient in the coal yard, they will also have access to the coal there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know to what extent oil is being used for fuel in the District of Columbia for public purposes?

Mr. SISSON. I do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The smoke fumes would indicate that something in addition to bituminous coal is being used, or there must be something wrong in the firing.

Mr. SISSON. Many of the grates in the District of Columbia have been constructed for hard coal only, and perhaps they are not so well suited for the burning of soft or bituminous coal as the grates made for it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman have any objection to my inserting in the RECORD a letter from the District Commissioners on the subject of the smoke nuisance?

Mr. SISSON. None at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting that letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 23, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: Your letter of the 15th instant has been received, asking whether there is or is not in force in the District of Columbia any law or regulation enabling the commissioners to prevent the emission of objectionable smoke from the smokestacks of the District. A law that in ordinary times is sufficient to enable the commissioners to accomplish the end named is found in the act entitled "An act for the prevention of smoke in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved February 2, 1899. A copy of this act (30 Stat., 812) is inclosed herewith.

The commissioners have themselves noted the increasing smokiness of the atmosphere of the Capital during recent months and share in your fears concerning the possible defacement of buildings and possible interference with the comfort and orderly maintenance of homes and places of business as the result of that condition. The commissioners have been unable, however, to find any practicable method of securing or even materially relieving the situation.

The recent increase in the smokiness of the atmosphere of the District has not been due to any lack of legal authority on the part of the commissioners to prevent it. It has been due to the state of the coal market, which has rendered it necessary to use in many of the heating and power plants in the District, if they are to be maintained at all, coal for which they were not designed, including, if current reports be true, much low-grade coal.

Where the commissioners have been unable to obtain any evidence of any inadequacy of the heating or power plant or of any carelessness or ignorance in its management, and where such evidence as they have been able to obtain has shown that the owner of the plant has been driven by the state of the coal market to the use of coal not adapted to his purpose, the commissioners have refrained from bringing prosecution. To have prosecuted in such cases would have been to undertake to penalize the proprietor of the plant for a condition entirely beyond his control. The only alternative he would have if he would avoid the payment of fine or the serving of a jail sentence under such circumstances would be to discontinue the operation of his establishment, and practically none of the offending establishments have been such as could be well closed without disturbance to the already too much disturbed housing and business situation in this District.

If there be any practicable way of preventing the emission of dense or thick black or gray smoke to a greater extent than it is now being prevented, the commissioners will welcome suggestions that will enable them to accomplish that end. They will be glad to cooperate with you in any action you may take to better existing conditions.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) LOUIS BROWNLOW,
Commissioner, District of Columbia.

HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The Clerk read the paragraph beginning on line 21, page 13.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, merely to make an inqury in regard to a resolution which I introduced in this House some three or four weeks ago. That resolution provided that a service flag with four stars, the number of the Congressmen who have gone to the colors, should be hung in this Hall. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts, and, as I understand it, the Committee on Accounts has favorably reported the resolution—that is, they have favorably passed upon it; but for some reason that resolution has not been brought before the House. I see one member of that committee on the floor, my colleague from New York [Mr. SANFORD], and if it is not violating any confidence of the committee, I would like to ask him why it is that that resolution, having passed the committee, has not been reported to the House?

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to object, but if I yield to one Member I will have to yield to another, and it will set a precedent.

Mr. HICKS. I know my friend is too good-natured to object.

Mr. SISSON. I suppose the gentleman can get the information privately from his friend, who is right close to him. I am sure he wants to facilitate the passage of this bill.

Mr. HICKS. I think probably the House would like to have the information. I know my genial friend from Mississippi will indulge me just for two minutes.

Mr. SISSON. I would not object if two minutes would be all, but it would set a precedent.

Mr. HICKS. I moved to strike out the last word, and I think I have two or three minutes left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. HICKS. I yield to my colleague from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

Mr. SISSON. One moment. I shall have to object, unless the gentleman's remarks are confined to the item in the bill. The gentleman has his request in the RECORD, and he can get the information from his friend.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, have I not the floor under my motion to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must proceed in order, and he will have to speak to this amendment if the point of order is made.

Mr. HICKS. My friend has not made the point of order, has he?

Mr. SISSON. I make the point of order, not because I want to make a point of order against the gentleman, because I would be very glad to give him all the leeway he wants, but I do not want to set a precedent that would give us trouble in the future.

Mr. HICKS. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that with every public building, religious edifice, office building, factory, and home decorated by service flags commemorating the patriotism and loyalty of those who are now with the colors, this Hall should honor the men who have responded to the call of the country. Four Members have donned the uniform of the Nation since war was declared—the lamented Gardner of Massachusetts, LAGUARDIA of New York, HEINTZ of Ohio, and JOHNSON of North Dakota.

I understand that the Committee on Accounts some time ago decided to report favorably a resolution I had introduced providing for the purchase of such a flag. For some unexplainable reason that resolution has never been called up on the floor, despite the fact that the Committee on Accounts is a privileged committee. Why the delay, Mr. Chairman, why the neglect to honor our brave colleagues who are fighting for the flag? I hope the chairman of the Committee on Accounts will explain the reason why this resolution has not been offered.

The Clerk read the paragraph beginning with line 21, on page 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk calls the attention of the Chair to a typographical error, in line 22, page 16, where the word "department" is incorrectly spelled. Without objection, it will be corrected.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the necessary and adequate means of approach and access to existing buildings or to temporary buildings which may hereafter be erected in the District of Columbia for the use of the United States, including the grading, paving, improvement, and repair of such streets, avenues, and roads, as in the judgment of the commissioners shall be necessary, including all necessary incidental work, $85,000, to be available immediately: Provided, That the foregoing work shall be done under the direction of the commissioners, by contract, day labor, or in such other manner as in their judgment may be most advantageous to the Government.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, in line 2, page 22, the word "foregoing" is misspelled. I ask unanimous consent to correct the typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It must be very evident to anyone who has walked around through the District of Columbia that the streets have been allowed to get into a condition of very bad repair. A great many of the asphalt pavements are full of holes and apparently have not been kept up. I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who has charge of this bill, what the members of the committee have done, whether they have simply taken the estimates submitted by the commissioners or whether they have taken the pains to go over the District and notice the condition of the streets themselves?

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman that the subcommittee went over the streets. I think the criticism that the streets have been permitted to get into this condition is in one sense of the word true, but it is due to the very severe winter, an unprecedented winter, and to the unprecedented amount of heavy hauling.

As I stated in my remarks explaining the bill, if the gentleman will go further down the bill he will find that we granted the District commissioners every dollar they asked for for the repair of streets. The only items we have not allowed were in the edges of the city, where there are some real estate improvements going on, and where in many instances streets were asked to be made when there were only two or three residents on that street. We have not granted pavements to all the streets in the outskirts of the city, but we have given the commissioners every dollar they asked for for the repair of streets in the District of Columbia.

The gentleman understands that the fund available for street improvement was not used during this very severe winter. These repairs that the gentleman is complaining about are going on as rapidly as the District Commissioners can get laborers to make them. In July the sum of money carried in the items following in the bill will, in the judgment of the committee, repair all of the defects and holes that the gentleman speaks of in the streets of the city.

Mr. DALLINGER. What I wanted to ascertain was whether the gentleman believes that the money given in the bill, in view of the severe winter, is sufficient to put the roads in good condition before next winter?

Mr. SISSON. I do think so, the subcommittee thought so, and the District engineer commissioner thinks so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction of suburban roads: For construction of suburban roads and suburban streets, to be disbursed and accounted for as "Construction of suburban roads and suburban streets," and for that purpose it shall constitute one fund, as follows:

Northwest. Otis Place, Georgia Avenue to Sixth Street, pave, $5,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee for information. This appropriation, as I understand it, is not the aggregate cost of the pavement, but is only the share that the Government pays for the pavement, the other being paid by the parties themselves.

Mr. SISSON. This is the cost of the new pavement. The streets named in this item are the new streets that have never been paved in the outskirts of the city.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the Government pay all the expenses of the original pavement?

Mr. SISSON. After the streets are paved 25 per cent of the initial cost of the pavement is collected from the property owners on either side. That is after the pavement is laid. The property is assessed for 25 per cent of the cost.

Mr. DOWELL. The Government pays it originally, and then it is assessed to the property owners and covered back into the Treasury?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; collected as taxes under the Borland amendment, except that on streets over 40 feet wide that in excess of 40 feet is borne one-half by the District treasury and one-half by the Federal Treasury.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the property owner on streets more than 40 feet wide pay any share of the pavement?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; he pays his portion of the costs within the 40 feet.

The Clerk read as follows:

To carry out the provisions contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914, which authorizes the commissioners to open, extend, or widen any street, avenue, road, or highway to conform with the plan of the permanent system of highways in that portion of the District of Columbia outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, there is appropriated, payable entirely from the revenues of the District of Columbia, such sum as is necessary for said purpose during the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so in order to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what part of the District of Columbia is "outside the city of Washington"?

Mr. SISSON. That is a term that has been carried in the bill for a long time. As I stated when I made my explanation of the bill, I have never been able to ascertain just why that language is carried. The old city of Washington has been designated in the bill as "within the city," and that outside is called suburban, and they are called roads and not streets, and yet they are built up as they are in the city of Washington. This is arbitrary language used in the bill when the city was small, when these were "roads" and not streets at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For that reason I propounded the question. It occurs to me that the time ought to come when in the bill we would treat the situation from a correct historical standpoint. I will say that I have several times gone into the matter and find the old city of Washington never had any boundaries.

Mr. SISSON. No very well-defined boundaries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The act of 1802 chartering the city of Washington gave it no boundaries whatever.

Mr. SISSON. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I made the inquiry with the view of having future bills written in accordance with the historical fact.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the city of Washington extend to the boundaries of the District of Columbia?

Mr. SISSON. It does.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I beg to differ with the gentleman; there is no city of Washington; there is only one municipality, and that is the District of Columbia.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman from Kentucky had listened to my explanation in my opening remarks on the bill, he would have found that I called attention to this arbitrary language, and said that there was no good reason for it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction and repair of sidewalks and curbs around public reservations and municipal and United States buildings, $25,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi what is the status of this Capitol Park? I notice that a number of buildings are still standing there that were standing there unremoved two or three years ago, and there is quite a section of that park that is not improved or graded. What is the status of it, and what is the prospect of that park ever being completed?

Mr. SISSON. I suppose the gentleman has reference to the property between the Capitol and the Union Station?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.
